

Chapter 1 : 5 Most Creative Homework Assignments: Homework That Works

Homework can be very challenging, especially for high-energy kids who have a hard time sitting still at school, much less at home. As a parent, you may find yourself at a loss as to how you can help your kids cope with their homework challenges.

But ESL students, on the other hand, may disagree. Young learners and teens may come to terms with the fact that they have to do homework, but do we want them to do it because they are compelled to do it Which would you prefer? The only way to get young students excited about doing homework, and get adults to set aside some time for it, is through highly creative and thoroughly engaging homework assignments. And here are 5 examples: Homework Assignments That Work 1 A Word Book A Word Book or Vocabulary Journal is a classic among teachers of very young learners who are not adept at using dictionaries; here they have a chance to make their own. Help them design their very own Word Book from scratch, out of construction paper, cardboard, or any materials you have on hand. At the end of a reading task or activity, make a list of the words they have learned for the day. Their homework assignment is to enter each of the new words in their Word Book. The littlest ones simply copy the word and draw a picture of it; older students can use the word in a sentence that illustrates its meaning. They may also cut out pictures from magazines or newspapers and get as creative as they like. This is an extremely engaging way to provide extended practice of any grammar point. Say you want your students to practice comparatives and superlatives. Tell them to go to Oscar. Which of the nominees for Best Picture is the longest film? Which is the shortest? Earned the most money at the box office? Which film has the most nominations? Which in your opinion is the best film? Compare two of the actresses nominated for Best Actress. Etc€! You may assign any number of research tasks: Most read the newspaper anyway, right? Or watch the evening news. Ask them to choose a news story that has piqued their interest, and have them: Write a report on the news story Write a dialogue in which a journalist interviews someone involved in the story. Give them an email to read and ask them to write an appropriate reply. Or give them a situation that would require them to compose a message, like a complaint over a bad service experience or an inquiry into vacation rentals. Choose a TV series that is shown in English, either with or without subtitles you may ask students to cover the subtitles. Tell your students that their homework for that night will be to watch an episode of Modern Family, whether they usually watch the show or not. Give them a task to complete after viewing the episode: If not, would you start watching it? Another great way to get students actively engaged in their homework assignments is to ask them to come up with some ideas for creative assignments on their own and share them with the class. They may surprise you! If you have any ideas for other wonderfully creative homework assignments, share them below! Impulsivity is another challenge, which can lead kids to be defiant or to argue, he says. D, clinical psychologist and author of Dreamers, Discoverers, and Dynamos: Parents may have a tough time knowing how to provide structure without pressure, she says. Consequently, parents might not know when to be firm and when to be patient, she says. Fortunately, while there are many challenges that come with raising kids with ADHD, there are also effective strategies and rewards. Both Kapalka and Palladino emphasize the importance of staying calm. Take homework time, for instance—“an activity that can feel like a tug-of-war. Set limits on your own behavior. Set structure—but make it pressure-free. So what does pressure-free structure look like? Give your kids the chance to make wise choices. For example, parents might ask, according to Palladino: Do you want to start with the clothes on the bed or clear the top of your desk? Use reasonable consequences for rule-breaking. As a start, Palladino suggests parents ask their child what the consequences should be if he or she breaks a rule. This helps kids create commitments that they can actually own, she says. In addition, create and consistently enforce positive consequences for positive behaviors and negative consequences for negative behaviors, Kapalka says. Why do you do this to me? Advocate for your child when appropriate. Certain accommodations might be necessary for your child because of his or her ADHD. However, you still want to encourage kids to cultivate their abilities. Palladino gives an example of finding this tricky balance: Avoid muting a headstrong child. She blogs regularly about body and self-image issues on her own blog, Weightless , and about creativity on her second blog Make a Mess. Retrieved on November 9, , from <https://> Jan 23, Articles Does your child always have a problem finishing homework correctly within a reasonable amount of time? Do you question why your child has to do homework at all? Understanding the purpose of homework “ and learning strategies for managing assignments effectively “ can be of great help to you and your child. What Is the Purpose of Homework? Practice is important because it helps your child master important skills. All too often, however, the kids who need the most practice are those who find homework to be harder, take longer, and raise negative feelings. Next, find out if she has learned enough at school to do the assignment on her own. One example would be an assignment sheet that the teacher reviews with the child and sends home for the parent to read and sign off on. Where Is Homework Done? For some kids, a small desk where supplies can be stored is the best place to do homework. In other homes, the kitchen table may be the best place. When Is Homework Done? For some kids, right after school is the perfect time to do the work because the assignment is fresh in their minds. Others need a break before they can tackle more school work. When you agree on the plans, write them down. That can make the task look even more distasteful. Instead, transition her from fun activities to activities less enjoyable but also less difficult than homework. For example, ask her to bring in the mail, then ask her to set the table, and follow that with a request to help you tear lettuce for the salad. The idea is to create a distance from the fun activity to the more difficult one by inserting small, neutral tasks. Resistance is less likely if the momentum of compliance is built first. If your child has problems focusing on a task, writes slowly, or needs more time to understand concepts, homework can take a lot longer. Sometimes just your sympathy can help. Reassure her that everyone makes mistakes and that mistakes help guide the next steps in the learning process. Encourage your child to talk to you about what she finds hard or confusing. Listen to her ideas on what would make homework easier. If assignments seem endless, break them into smaller parts. For a young child, fold worksheets into two or three parts to reduce feelings of being overwhelmed. For older students, have them highlight sections of the assignment in different colors, green “ first part, yellow “ second part, red “ last. Visually communicate progress towards completion. Take a small strip of paper and divide it into four to eight parts. Periodically, come by with an encouraging word and draw a star or make a check in one of the sections. The chart and homework should be completed at the same time. Let her choose a pleasurable activity she can do immediately following homework, e. Diana Browning Wright, M.

Effects Academic performance Homework research dates back to the early s. However, no consensus exists on the general effectiveness on homework. Low-achieving students receive more benefit from doing homework than high-achieving students. Essentially, they advocate for doing potentially unnecessary homework from approximately age five to ten as a way of practicing for doing necessary homework from age 10 to No research has ever been conducted to determine whether this claim has any merit. For all three of the correlations, higher values represent a higher correlation between time spent on homework and poor conduct. Health and daily life Homework has been identified in numerous studies and articles as a dominant or significant source of stress and anxiety for students. Students in the survey who were ridiculed or punished by parents and peers had a higher incidence of depression symptoms, with 2. Stress was especially evident among high school students. Students that reported stress from homework were more likely to be deprived of sleep. In the MetLife study, high school students reported spending more time completing homework than performing home tasks. However, Kiewra et al. The students slept an average of 6 hours 48 minutes, lower than the recommendations prescribed by various health agencies. A study done at the University of Michigan in concluded that the amount of homework given is increasing. In a sample taken of students between the ages of 6 and 9 years, it was shown that students spend more than 2 hours a week on homework, as opposed to 44 minutes in With few students interested in higher education , and due to the necessity to complete daily chores, homework was discouraged not only by parents, but also by school districts. In , the California legislature passed an act that effectively abolished homework for those who attended kindergarten through the eighth grade. But, in the s, with increasing pressure on the United States to stay ahead in the Cold War , homework made a resurgence, and children were encouraged to keep up with their Russian counterparts. By the end of the Cold War in the early s, the consensus in American education was overwhelmingly in favor of issuing homework to students of all grade levels. The weekly average for the subject is 5 hours. The main distinction for UK homework is the social gap, with middle-class teenagers getting a disproportionate amount of homework compared to Asia and Europe.
