Ticketing On a trip like this there is always the question of whether to book in advance. Doing so provides certainty but at the expense of flexibility. On this occasion I did decide to book in advance in so far as was possible: Even then the train I wanted was sold out so plumped for an earlier one. The Nanning to Hanoi ticket is only available within China. There are some online agencies who ticket it internationally but this process takes time and brings additional cost. It also requires proof of Vietnamese visas where relevant. So I simply decided to take a chance of getting the Nanning to Hanoi ticket on the day of departure at Nanning station. Once there, I went to window one the English-speaking window at Nanning station and bought the tickets easily. There were multiple spare soft sleeper berths on the train. For the Vietnamese tickets I asked the concierge at our hotel in Hanoi the Metropole to book them for me in advance. They have a dedicated travel advisor who was helpful and efficient and did that. I needed to pay in cash and presume that I paid some sort of service fee I did not check but the process was painless. At the Vietnamese stations we visited the level of English spoken was low but the ticket desks often only had a queue of one or two people so it would have been fairly easy to buy them in person, it seems. Again none of the trains was full to bursting. Again we paid a small premium for this but I felt that it was well worth it. Van booked the ticket, issued us with a ticket voucher, then later collected us by taxi from our hotel and dropped us at the bus station, making sure that we received our bus tickets through exchanging the ticket voucher. She was friendly and helpful. Some travel agencies in Vietnam do seem unscrupulous but this one worked fine. The bus had empty seats and, if you chose the bus company you wanted and went to their departure point, you could probably purchase a ticket easily. However for me the travel agent here made things easier and smoother at little cost. The tuk tuk from the dock to Siem Reap was arranged dockside in Phnom Penh. Our only ticketing problem was from Siem Reap to Poiphet. In retrospect, we should have arranged it in advance through our hotel or a reputable local travel agent. Instead, we simply went to the bus station before the scheduled departure time as per Seat 61 "€" this was the only time the information failed us, although it may well have been our fault rather than that the information was wrong. The bus station was the epicentre of multiple bus companies and booking companies there and in a nearby street and there was a strong feeling of a risk of scams, with multiple people offering to sell us tickets cash upfront for buses they promised would arrive later from somewhere else. Instead, we opted to arrange a private car through one of those agencies. As I say, in future I would pre-arrange the bus. In Aranyaprathet, we bought the tickets on the day of departure at the station. The booking office opens around one hour before each of the two daily scheduled departures to Bangkok. Again, the train was not full and I imagine that you could turn up and buy a ticket for immediate departure on most days. Visas You may want to read our separate posts on visas for China , Vietnam and Cambodia. Accommodation We prebooked most accommodation through the Hong Kong travel agent Travel Expert and one night in a newly opened property in Siem Reap through Agoda at an excellent price. For Guangzhou we simply walked into a local hotel in Tianhe district on the evening of arrival. Some of the hotels on this route offer free transfer from the airport and often also from the railway station, which can be a considerable benefit. For example, we arrived in Vietnam around dawn with no local currency and opted to walk to our hotel. That was a lot of fun but a pickup from the hotel would have been more convenient. A few points to mention: Think about whether it is worth prebooking Hong Kong to Guangzhou! That service requires a ticket on a specific service from its sparse timetable and the tickets are non-refundable. The trains were good throughout. The Vietnamese trains lack dining cars though they do have hot water boilers at the end of each carriage and a food cart service. The boat trip was excellent fun and a lovely way to see Cambodia. Although I opted not to go to Angkor Wat, an afternoon or early morning there many people recommend sunrise fits well with this itinerary. Sunset near the far reaches of Bangkok Conclusion This was an enjoyable trip which ran very smoothly. It makes for an unusual and interesting way to travel between Hong Kong and Bangkok, or for that matter Hanoi. It does benefit from some planning, but that is easy and relatively fast to do. It can almost all be done from Hong Kong and can be done at relatively short notice.
