Chapter 1 : How do I convince my parents to let me wear whatever I want? | Yahoo Answers

To convince your parents to let you do anything, you'll need to craft a strong case for the activity in question before even approaching them, then ask about it in a calm, polite tone when your parents are relaxed and able to listen.

Share via Email Encourage your children to take risks. They may even become fans of the same boy bands or share a tent at Glastonbury. They splash cash and offer hour catering. Not that this applies to you, although your sprog may soon be trogging off to college or Peru. September is the cruellest month for separation anxiety. And so we muddle the bounds, with a little help from technology. En route from dropping them at uni, we text the darlings. Our messages are superficially comforting. Did we forget something? Have they got cash, cake and condoms? Will they be sure to Skype this evening? When shall we come for a visit? In times past, children would probably have cut their apron strings sooner. My bid for freedom followed O-levels. At 16, I flounced out of my Cheshire home with a rucksack, a leaky umbrella and an indeterminate plan to become a Scottish crofter. I got as far as hitchhiking to Carlisle before the rain pelted down and nobody would give me a lift. When I phoned home, my dad just said: Next time, I crossed the border and stayed. A year after, I hitched to Istanbul and back. The prevailing wisdom of my parents was that children need a pinch of risk as much as vitamins. Without it, they will never learn a thing and probably turn into Howard Hughes, the once reckless aviator who ended his days encased in a latex tent with inch fingernails. I do speak about relative risk. Nor do I complain that after centuries of preferring horses to children, Britons have become more caring as parents and no longer stick minors up chimneys or birch their bums. I belong to an excellent charity called Children are Unbeatable, which is dedicated to ending the right of parents to commit common assault on their young. Consider the case of the black-headed gull – a pest in some eyes – but probably a better parent than we humans. Mother bird simply locks the larder once junior can fly, having attained an adult size and weight. The rule is simple: But the young bird adapts. A time that we as social animals sometimes seem determined to push into middle age. All parents "fail" in some sense. A noted shrink once told me: But I do suggest that an overprotected child is a deprived one and if they find themselves in an arrested stage of development they should make a claim for psychological abuse. But the evidence from history suggests that a sterner environment is perfectly capable of training this undeveloped brain into well-intended social action from the early teens, whether that activity is becoming the head of the household like a child in modern Bangkok or fighting the fascists in the last world war. So when adolescents do depart, how can a helicopter parent come to terms with slowing their rotors and whirling less dervishly? I promise you that. It also occurred to us that not worrying about our womb fruit pleasuring his playmate with mixed grills, all-night movies and the spare mattress might in itself constitute a home improvement. And so he left. I felt down but not distraught. We passed happy days refurbishing everything. The new carpets were as swish as an ice rink. But at this moment, half a year on, our prodigal hit the financial rocks, reoccupied his old quarters and while finalising a work of art, mainly in the bathroom sink, succeeded in scattering indelible pink ink from a leaky Tesco bag into the centre of the virgin Axminster. Second, and far more importantly, separation is good and essential for you both. Otherwise, how will they manage to put your affairs in order on the day you die? Since you cannot promise to live forever, you have to learn to let them go. But for your own sake and to follow up this idea scan the works of the brilliant psychologist Erik Erikson you need to deal with the "tasks" of your very different stage of life. These do not include getting down on the dancefloor with the kids but facing up to the fact that, as a parent, you are becoming unemployed and are confronted by a void of bereavement that you must confront. For as long as you cling to your children like a lifebelt, you will cease to grow up.

Chapter 2 : A Parent's Ultimate Guide to YouTube | Common Sense Media

If you constantly ask, argue, or fight for whatever it is you want, your parents will be less than eager to help you get it. Whenever talking about the item you want, keep an ear open for what your parents have to say.

A couple of small issues: Monitor, mouse, keyboard, OS? Not an insignificant amount of money for a single christmas present. What do you have now? I already have those from my dinosaur PC. Motopsychojdn Dec 11, , If you want a gaming pc, then buy it for maximum euro. My parents are very poor, so they cant afford a normal pc for me. Be happy with what you have. With Christmas coming up, my parents asked me what I wanted for a present. I presented them with a list of things I would like, but I told them that this gaming PC was my first priority. Unfortunately, my mother is less than enthralled with this idea. My mom gave me some arguments, some of which I was able to counter, but there are still two main ones that I make her wary of the idea. I know that this is a long post, but thanks to anyone who gives me advice! Hey dude, im going through the same thing , but my plan is kinda gonna work. Im also 16, even if this post is years old and u already might have got a PC, this can help others who is looking into this. It doesnt have to be the best case or fully modular and stuff. But it sure can get you creative and give your parents a feeling that you know something about computers and is ready to work with it. Put your ideas in, Add RGB strips, beautiful looking panels etc etc. Just plan it out and then start building. In the end, you can showcase this with your old PC and then talk to your parents about a beautiful PC u need to build in that. Ask a new question.

Chapter 3 : How do you convince your parents to buy you something

Your parents will allow you to do more, trust you more and be more willing to see life from your perspective. Try the tips below and let me know how they work out! 1.

No matter who your parents are, there are a few things that you can do to drastically increase the chance of having them say "YES" rather than "NO. Parents love to pretend they are cool and collected, but in reality, they are very predictable. So much so that I guarantee that if you read the tips below, you can improve your life in several ways! Your parents will allow you to do more, trust you more and be more willing to see life from your perspective. Try the tips below and let me know how they work out! Ask with gratitude, show appreciation! Nothing gets you a faster "No" from parents than giving them a feeling that they owe you or that you "deserve" things. Sure, they are responsible for your well-being and all that, but this is not an exercise in fairness. Saying, "Dad, can I have an Electric Guitar? This is really great, thank you. The point is not to trick your parents into thinking you care; the point is that appreciation spreads good will, which will certainly come back to you. Trade what you want for what you can do You may ask: They hold all the cards! Your parents care about one thing having to do with you almost more than anything: Your growing up into a responsible, happy adult. Any way you can show them that you are moving in the right direction will help your case endlessly. So, when asking for something, also offer something in return. Two things you can always offer are doing specific chores and getting better grades in specific topics. Being specific is important because that way, the results can be measured. Otherwise, your promise can have the opposite effect. Make them look good One thing your parents care about, whether they admit it or not, is how they appear to others. Adults often feel judged about their parenting skills, and any way you can help them to feel confident as parents is a good thing. So, when hanging around your parents in public, put your grown-up pants on. Make polite conversation with their friends. Answer their redundant questions as interestingly as possible. Contribute to the social scene. Match funds "Mom, I really need a new pair of jeans. I tried them on at the mall. If I pay for half of them with my babysitting money, can you contribute the rest? Mom will probably buy it for you outright! Earn credit, slowly When you want Mom or Dad to buy you something small, then just go ahead and ask. Figure out small things that will make you seem more responsible and do them. Offer to take on small responsibilities and always do what you said you would do and a tiny bit more. When that happens, asking for things will have a much higher rate of success. Be part of the solution, not the problem We all feel mistreated and deserving of more sometimes. Sometimes we really are. However, being mature sometimes means being happy with what we have! So, lower the rate of drama. When a sibling starts something, be the mature one and let it go. All this builds confidence and credit. I want you to think about it before answering. Stage your requests carefully Setting the stage for any question you want to pop is a key to increasing the odds for "Yes"! Follow these rules for shifting things in your favor: Figure out the reason they turned you down and then ask what you have to do to make it a "Yes. I want that too. How can I show you that? Your parents want to give you things! Your parents love you and look for opportunities to make your life better. They need to feel that you appreciate and deserve what you get. Learn how to ask and you will be rewarded.

Even if you and your parents have a great relationship, you want to find your own path and make your own choices. Here are some tips to make it easier. Find something trivial to chat about each day. Talk about how your team did at the track meet. Share something one of your teachers said. If you feel your relationship with your parents is strained, try easing into conversations. Mention that cute thing the dog did. When parents feel connected to your daily life, they can be there for you if something really important comes up.

Difficult Topics

Maybe you need to break bad news to a parent, like getting a speeding ticket or failing an exam. Here are 3 steps to help you prepare for that talk. What you hope to achieve can vary. So you can say why you want to talk in a way that communicates what you need. Can I tell you about it? Identify Your Feelings Things like personal feelings or sex are awkward to discuss with anyone, let alone a parent. But instead of letting those feelings stop you from talking, put them into words as part of the conversation. It can help to defuse things by beginning with a statement like, "Mom, I have something to tell you. But I know I need to tell you. Can you hear me out? Ask, "Can we talk? Is now a good time? When is a good time? Think ahead about what you want to say or ask. Write down the most important ideas if you need to. Emotions and past experiences can get in the way. Will parents take you seriously, believe what you say, listen to and respect your opinions, and hear you out without interrupting? A lot depends on your parent. Some parents are easy to talk to, some are great listeners, and some are harder to approach. But some of what happens depends on you, too. Since communication is a two-way street, the way you talk can influence how well a parent listens and understands you. So here are some guidelines to consider when talking to parents: Be clear and direct. Be as clear as you can about what you think, feel, and want. Give details that can help parents understand your situation. If you sometimes hide the truth or add too much drama, parents will have a harder time believing what you tell them. Try to understand their point of view. If you can, say so. Telling parents you understand their views and feelings helps them be willing to see yours, too. Try not to argue or whine. If you think your emotions might get the better of you, do something to blow off steam before talking: Go for a run. Do whatever it takes to sound calm when you need to. They might listen respectfully, understand your point of view, and do everything you need except say yes. It can be hard to take no for an answer. But gracefully accepting a no can help you get more yeses in the future. Some parents have troubles of their own. Others have a hard time being flexible. Find a relative, a teacher, or a counselor who will listen, understand, encourage, believe in you, and care. Acting respectfully demonstrates maturity. Parents are more likely to think of their children as grown up and, as a result, capable of making more important decisions when they see them acting maturely.

Your parents just want to do what's best for you, and many of them didn't have the opportunities you do, so understand that but stop using them as an excuse! You have the power to do whatever you want, you have the choice to choose the life you create.

Posted in Moving Guides Yes, you can. How to convince your parents to move to a different house? How to convince parents to move schools or to let you move out by yourself? If you really want it, there are great techniques that will not only fulfill your dream but will also help you grow and become the adult that you feel that you can be. Anything is possible, right? And now imagine the joy and satisfaction of actually applying the right steps to making your wish come true – this is your guide on how to convince parents to move house or to let you move out on your own. How to Convince Your Parents to Move out Participate in the housework and contribute to payments like utilities, mortgage, etc. Tell your parents that you want to take more responsibility for your life and you wish to contribute to their work. Make a plan with them about doing the house cleaning or washing the dishes, walking the dog, etc. They will surely approve and welcome any initiative on your behalf. If you include this in your plan on how to convince your parents to move out, they will surely look at you differently. Agree with them about how much money you will be able to spare to contribute to the monthly expenses. Of course, in order to do that, you should already have a job. Even a part time or seasonal job would do at first. If you show your parents that you are learning to be an adult, a responsible person, when you finally tell them that you want to move out, they will let you, because they will know you are ready to take care of yourself. If you cannot find work, even just taking up more activities at home will be noticed and appreciated. How to convince your parents to move out is easy when you know what you are doing. Get a few online quotes from movers, too - in this way you will show you are serious about your moving plans. If you are thinking of how to convince your parents to move somewhere – make a schedule and list the things to be done. Decide what you want to do, how you want to achieve it and estimate how much time and money you will need. Make a plan to get a job, have some savings to pay for your move and have some cash in case it takes you a while to find a new job in the city or town you are moving to. This is one of the great ways on how to convince your parents to move out. Your parents will approve of the idea better if you show them you have a plan of what to do and it is a logical and reasonable one. Your parents are interested in your safety and security and they can be convinced if they know that you know how to take care of yourself. Convincing adults with reasonable arguments is definitely more productive. If you show them that you have a precise time and financial plan they will understand that you are serious about your intentions. The fact that you are actually making plans will demonstrate that you are taking the necessary steps to take care of yourself rather than wait for them to give you money, for example. Be logical and reasonable. After you have taken steps 1 and 2 it is time to get ready for the whole move. This is how you can convince your parents that you are ready to live on your own. Decide where you want to live, look for properties, make a relocation plan. If you will be changing schools, search for a new school and learn how you can apply. Decide what you want to take with you and get a few online quotes without signing anything yet! You should be ready with a realistic idea of how much money you will need every month and be ready to cover that. When you are ready, make a powerpoint presentation or prepare a speech and ask your parents to hear it out. This is also a great way on how to convince parents to move schools! Make a table with the time and money that you will need for the next few months, tell them that you have the savings to move out and the money to live for a month or two until you get a job. Even if you cannot be fully independent financially, the fact that you are aware of it and have made serious and realistic plans will most probably impress them and you will get them to agree. How to convince parents to move house and live on your own or with roommates – be realistic in your expectations. If your parents get impressed by your preparation, they will not only approve of your relocation, but also support you and help you. This is how to how to convince your parents to move somewhere without them even noticing it! Show them that things can be better by paying attention to everything that can be improved. This may get them thinking. Let your parents know that they can have a better home or live in a better neighborhood! Research of the possibility. See what better school you can find for yourself, how you can be admitted, and check out property that you and your parents will possibly like. See some prices and try to figure out costs of living. Collect photos of houses, addresses and schools. Look for things that your parents will like in the new area you want to live in or the house you liked. This is how to convince parents to move house with ease. And until you know it, they may begin to make plans for relocation without you even saying a thing! Try to do more things at home like do the dishes or vacuum the house without having been told. This will show that you are more mature now, you can take more responsibility and you can be trusted more. This is important, because when you tell your parents about the idea that you have, you can promise to do some part of the work related to the relocation and they will know you are reliable. My Moving Reviews offers many checklists and tips with great info on relocation so you already have the moving database you need for your preparations. Make an interesting presentation. Arrange in a nice powerpoint presentation eventual houses to live in with information about the area, prices and cost of living. There is so much information over the internet about all these things. You can also take a look at our city moving guides. If you let your parents know you have done some of the job that generally they have to do, it is like if they really want to move, they will have less to do because you have made things simpler for them and they can also count on you to help them organize the move. A relocation is usually lots of work and is stressful, so your support will be greatly appreciated. Giving up on a party or a night out with friends to do some housework is difficult but once you start to make more plans about how to show your parents you are growing up and you are more mature, they will trust you more and will change the way they treat you because you are proving to them you can do more things. Being more responsible is also something good for you – one day, when you move out, you will for sure need to pay bills, make financial plans and manage a home anyway. And if you start earlier with little things, later it will be easier for you when you finally move out. In any case do not beg, cry, fight, argue, etc. If your parents cannot afford the house you want, do not insist. If they are happy where they are, do not make them move, would you be happy to see them miserable? Show them that you are thinking like an adult and be logical and reasonable, rather than only emotional. In this way you will speak to them on their language. Now you know how to convince your parents to move to a different house! And if you have more tips to add to these, you can make a comment to share them.

Chapter 6 : How to Convince Your Parents to Let You Do Anything

Whatever you do, don't throw a tantrum, get defensive, get mad, talk back to them, bribe them, blackmail them, or beg them; they'll think you're immature. Keep showing that you are responsible, and your parents might change their minds.

When your child cuts you out of her life it provokes deep feelings of shame, guilt, bewilderment, and hurt, all of which can easily turn to anger. Sometimes, of course, there are circumstances in which cutting off from a parent is the only viable option for an adult child age 18 and older, for instance, in the case of past or present physical, emotional or sexual abuse from a parent. And when you are in the dark, the easiest thing to blame is yourself—to believe that you failed as a parent. Many adult children struggle with their parents, or with money issues, etc. Why do some cut off while others go through similar struggles and stay connected? We have a fight or flight response just like other species. And some people are more prone to distancing flight when emotional intensity gets high. Joe was living at home after college, and his parents felt he was aimless. They would nag, yell, and question him daily as to his game plan. He would be vague or get nasty, which caused his parents to get on his back even more. Eventually, Joe moved out. When a person distances from others, they feel a sense of relief because the distance seemingly brings the conflict to an end. Of course, nothing is actually resolved; instead, more stress is generated. On the outside, it looks as though Joe and his parents are disconnected. But on the inside, they are actually thinking about each other all the time and remain overly focused on one another. They are, in fact, still extremely involved with one another: Neither is free from the original problem; nor are they free from each other. Cutting Off Distancing, at its extreme, turns to cutting off. It can occur after long periods of conflict or as a sudden reaction to a difficult encounter. Whatever the issue, the person doing the cutting off has difficulty addressing and resolving the problem directly and maturely. Instead, like Joe, they stop communicating. Continuing the relationship seems unmanageable to them. When a parent and child are too emotionally bound up with each other, they are more susceptible to cutting off when anxiety is high. Joe and his parents, for instance, were overly involved and entangled with each other. He was not taking responsibility for himself, nor were his parents taking responsibility for themselves. Instead they nagged, begged and hoped he would change. He dug his heels in deeper, did less when pushed, and refused to address his part of the problem. They were living in reaction to one another, rather than each taking responsibility for their part of the family conflict. Should you contact your child or not? How long should you try? What should you say? Get Support Being cut off by your child, with no ability to understand, communicate and resolve things, is difficult enough. In addition to reaching out to friends and family, consider joining a support group. If you are not able to function at your best, get some professional help. Continue to reach out to him, letting him know that you love him and that you want to mend whatever has broken. Send birthday and holiday messages as well as occasional brief notes or emails. Simply say that you are thinking about him and hope to have the opportunity to reconnect. Send your warmth, love and compassion—as you get on with your life. And in their attempt to be supportive, friends and family may fuel your feelings of betrayal, inadvertently increasing your anger. Anger is natural, but not helpful. Step back and try to understand what led to this estrangement. What patterns were operating in your family dance? If you can look at your family from a more factual vantage point, it may feel less personal. No one is to blame. Now if the door opens, you will be in a much better position to reconcile. Listen to her perceptions of what wrongs took place. Even if you disagree with her, look for the grains of truth. Be willing to look at yourself. So prepare yourself to handle this. Your adult child may need to hold on to blame as a way to manage her own anxiety. Just letting her know that you hear her will go a long way. Keep in mind that she, too, had to be in tremendous pain to reach the point of shutting you out. Try to empathize with her pain rather than get caught up in the hurt and anger. Focus on Yourself, Not Your Child If you do begin communicating again, you will be in a position to learn from the mistakes of the past and work toward an improved relationship. Put your efforts into changing yourself, not your child. Let go of your resentments regarding the estrangement.

Understand his need to flee and forgive him. Understanding and Hope Get to know the adult child you have, not the child you think he should have been. Allow him to get to know you. If your child still has made no contact, grieve the loss and know there is still hope. Try to manage your anxiety, and do the right thing by staying in touch with him in a non-intrusive way: Rather than blame yourself or your child for this pain, use your energy to learn about yourself, your own family history and patterns in your other relationships. Look for other patterns of cutting off in your family tree. Remember that shutting a person out is a response to anxiety and a family that is overly entangled with one another. The love and caring is there; the ability to solve differences is not. You did not make your child to turn away. That was her decision. It may have been a poor one, but it was the best she could do at the time. Try to get your focus off of her at least 50 percent of the day, which will make a difference. Your pain is real. Chapter 7 : How to Easily Convince Your Parents to Move out

You're basically saying to your parents, "I want to work with you, I don't just want to get my way." Yeah, you may have to do annoying stuff, but it will be worth it if in the end you get what you want.

In fact, according to a survey of U. However, the YouTube Kids has problems of its own. And digging into the videos themselves -- watching with your kids or on your own -- is wise. Also, read our detailed review of YouTube. The Basics Watch with your kid. Many kids naturally want to share the videos they like. But be prepared to watch some weird stuff such as unboxing videos. Watch a few videos by the same creator to get a feel for the content. Encourage your kids to subscribe to their favorite channels rather than hunting around on YouTube for the latest ones from a specific creator. Subscribers are notified when a new video is uploaded, plus all their channels are displayed in the Subscriptions section, making it easier, and faster, to go directly to the stuff they like. Consider choosing subscriptions together, and make an event out of watching the newest uploads with your kids. The Nitty-Gritty Investigate the creator. Check out our recommendations of positive role models on YouTube. Look at the suggestions. The suggested videos listed on the right-hand side of the page are related in some way to the main video. Evaluate them to see if they seem age-appropriate, and that will provide an indication of the appropriateness of the main video. Learn how to make these suggested videos a little safer. There are tons of ads on YouTube. Channel creators can moderate their comments to reduce the amount of negativity. Well-groomed comments are a good sign. Many creators make highlight reels and trailers -- basically video ads for the channels themselves which usually appear first on the channel page. Be aware that YouTube is technically only for teens 13 and up, and what the site considers age-appropriate may not match your values. But YouTube offers a filter called Restricted Mode that limits the iffy stuff. Go to your account settings page and toggle on Restricted Mode at the bottom of the page. It will remain on for logged-in users on the same browser. Most kids find out about new videos either from their friends or by clicking on the related videos which may or may not be appropriate. But YouTube itself offers several ways to home in on quality content. Also, read our reviews.

Chapter 8 : 3 Ways to Convince Your Parents to Get You Something - wikiHow

The next time you want to go to a concert, a party, or a road trip that your parents don't want you to go on, make sure you don't whine or cry or throw a hissy fit. I can't tell you the number of times I've seen my friends complain that they aren't getting their way, only to see them interact with their parents and understand completely.

Steps Research your topic. Make sure you know what you are asking for, so when your parents have a question you will have an acceptable, factual answer. Explaining your case in a well thought-out manner may help your parents feel more comfortable, because you will seem mature and knowledgeable about what you want. If you want a body piercing or tattoo, have the number of the establishment or some reliable websites about the practice. It is not a good idea to ask when either parent seems stressed or annoyed. Find a good time when your parents are relaxed and happy. Give them time to think about it. Tell them to get back to you in a couple hours or days with any questions or concerns they have. Let them know that this is not a childish wish – that you want to discuss this as mature, responsible adults and you are willing to work through issues. If the answer is no, let it be. You will need to try again at another time. Keep showing that you are responsible, and your parents might change their minds. As long as you do it in a mature fashion, most parents will be happy to give you reasons. Ask them their concerns and try to address them. This may change their minds. Clean up your act. Parents take your history of behavior here into consideration. Make sure you keep your history clean, mature, and reasonable. Let them see how responsible you are. If you have recently had a bad history, wait a while and do your best to win back their trust Show them that you are growing up: Be nice to them. Write a convincing and persuading letter and notes to parents, write list of the reasons why do you convince them and the plans that you made. Switch up your strategy. Showing them that you have lots of great info on what you are debating is a good way to persuade your parents to do something. Tips Realize that most parents want their children to be safe, and all have different values and various viewpoints about the things you may want to do. If they will not relent, you may have to accept defeat and wait until a time where you are better prepared to make your own decisions. Try and say more than they did, to make it sound like you have a stronger point. You will gain the most respect by showing respect in turn. If you want to eat meat in a vegetarian family, do not blame them or scold them for making you a vegetarian. Throwing a tantrum, crying, begging, or pleading may give them more of a reason to say no. Just remain calm and keep your voice at a normal level.
