Most of this blog is a diary to how much I loved living in this wonderful city. It was an adventure. Three weeks ago, my husband and I moved out to the Japanese countryside. I lived in Tokyo for almost three years, most of it with my husband Ryosuke. Tokyo should have been everything we ever wanted – a big city with awesome, driven people. Unique boutiques, interesting start-ups, diversity, convenience, safety, and plenty of other people just like me. Which in itself is a bit odd. In Texas, we always lived in smaller cities – only an hour or so away from Austin. Then we moved to Ghana. Ghana, of course, has large cities, but nothing like Tokyo. I did college in a small town outside of Philadelphia. Tokyo was my first time. I have so many fond memories of living in Tokyo – but also quite a few not-so-fond memories. These are the things I hated about living in Tokyo. Trains may stop at midnight, but Tokyo never sleeps. There is always stuff going on. People tell me that with love. But oh man, Tokyo puts me to shame. My husband was working 14 hour work days – and he was still one of the first people to leave the office every single day. As I rode the train out of main part of Tokyo back home at But we lived off a major road – which just made the air worse. Twice a month I would clean our outside windows, tinted grey with exhaust fumes. I started noticing a real change when I went jogging. When we were out in the countryside, I could easily run for an hour in the afternoon, as a break. But in Tokyo, after about 3k, I was wheezing and coughing. I have very sensitive lungs – I always have. The everyday noises never stop. One of the other downsides of living next to a major road which really, was our mistake was the constant noise. Motorcycles with no mufflers and cars designed to make more noise someone please tell me why this is cool? Ambulances drove by, lights flashing, at least once an hour. Downtown was even worse. Everything about Tokyo was expensive. The food especially fresh vegetables. Can you sense a theme here? Like, all over Tokyo. Because trains in the mornings and evenings look like this: A couple months ago, I had to meet someone downtown at like 8: This is what that looks like, in case you are wondering on either side of the crowd are two trains, with people trying to shove themselves on. Now imagine dealing with these kinds of crowds everywhere you go. Breathing in the same air everyone is breathing out – filled with stale breath, sweat, and body odor. Death and suicide About a month and a half ago, I saw someone die. My work table was next to our giant window you know, the one overlooking a major road. I heard a crash and looked outside. A motorcycle smashed into a car turning into our building someone who lived just upstairs, actually. The motorcyclist was thrown about ten meters. There was a lot of blood. His legs were bent funny. His body was directly under my window, no more than ten meters, and his face was pointed at my window. The driver got out of the car and started crying. Ryosuke got off of work two hours later. If circumstances were different, that could have been him. Then they scrubbed the blood off the road. By the time Ryosuke got home, two hours later, any evidence that an accident would happen was completely gone – save the for car parked three spaces next to ours, with a giant dent in the back. Two weeks later, we saw a bicyclist run a red light and smash into a delivery bike that jumped the green light like a motorcycle with a box on the back – delivering pizza. Both people hit the road. Ryosuke and I helped the delivery man pick up his bike. As far as we could tell, he was ok. Still – it was scary. As soon as I hung up the phone, a wave of guilt washed over me. Things are cramped together and tiny! My first apartment had this other house nearby. Every time I passed it, I marveled the fact that someone could actually live in there. Or, like, fit in there. I like having elbow room. Living in Tokyo is a lot like that. We like hiking, long distance biking, farming, and skipping stones on bodies of water. We live and thrive in the daylight. Honestly, we both learned so much about ourselves by living in the largest city in Japan – it was a thrilling and wonderful experience. Or, in this case, move out. Neither of us wants to leave Japan – we really do enjoy living here. I loved living in Tokyo. But I also kind of hated it.

Chapter 2 : 12 Things I Love about Living in Japan

If I Lived in Japan has 3 ratings and 3 reviews. Rachel said: This is a really awesome book to read in your classroom to teach them about the culture.

After all, Japan is seen as a great place to set up home for many people over the world. Particularly in an era of less stability in many parts of the world, both economically and culturally, perhaps Japan is a pretty sensible choice. Crime is famously low here, and you are likely to feel safe in any part of Japan. There are plenty of jobs knocking around, particularly for teaching and in technology industries. The law is generally progressive, and you have the basic freedoms and rights you would enjoy in the west. However, the process of trying to stay here permanently can be a confusing one. This article will try to give you an easily understood and clear overview of the steps you should take to become a Japanese national. There are two important things to consider and be aware of before even beginning to start a naturalization application process. The first is to find out if you are eligible. It will waste your time and money. The second factor to consider and one which is quite important is to decide whether you want to become a citizen or just hold permanent residency in Japan. On the other hand, becoming a citizen means you can vote, hold public office, have public jobs such as a judge or prosecutor, travel abroad for a long time without needing a re-entry permit, and not risk deportation if you commit a crime. It really depends on what matters to you most as an individual. If you really are committed to staying in Japan for the rest of your life, going for naturalization may be the option for you. Otherwise, have a real think about it! It is a truly life-changing decision. You will need to have worked legally in Japan for at least 5 years when you start making the application. Please also note that if some of this time includes being on a student visa and studying here, that will not be accepted as part of the five years. You must be over 20 years of age at the time of application and also be deemed an adult in your home country according to their legal definition of being an adult. Definitely, check this one! You should not have broken any laws or avoided paying any dues such as taxes or insurance fees during your time so far in Japan. Be warned that even minor offenses such as traffic violations could seriously hinder the naturalization process. You should be deemed as mentally stable and as not posing any sort of threat to national security or lifestyle. Basically, your behavior and general record will be judged, to ascertain whether you can be a law-abiding citizen in Japan. You must be willing to renounce your former nationality and citizenship. You should be able to prove you can look after yourself. This means you need a stable and reasonable source of income and are able to support yourself and any family you have here. This includes showing you could contribute to Japanese life in some way, such as through your work or through voluntary or charity work. Finally, you should possess decent Japanese language skills, particularly in oral communication. You should really have a decent grasp of basic written Japanese kanji and kana, but speaking is the most important aspect. Important Things to Note jp. The naturalization application should be made to the Bureau of Legal Affairs first for assessment. The assessment takes 10 months to one year or more, depending on each case. After the successful assessment, a Personal Identification Card is issued and your new nationality needs to be reported at your local municipality office. Once your Japanese nationality is approved, a Family Register is given to you and the residence card should be returned to the Immigration Bureau. Then, you will become a Japanese national. If you marry a Japanese national, the amount of time eligible for the application is reduced to 3 years. This means that if you are deemed to be an HSP, you can apply for citizenship after a shorter time of living here. You cannot become a citizen of Japan by just merely being born there. If you are born to a Japanese father and a foreign woman, you will get nationality automatically if your father accepts you as a child, even if the marriage ends in divorce. These are just some of the things you need to know about becoming a Japanese citizen. I hope you keep them in mind when applying for naturalization. For the most up-to-date information, you can visit your nearest immigration office in Japan or the websites below. The best of luck with your decision and application!

The truth is, each country has its own good and bad points. Here are the 12 things I love about living in Japan:

Availability of vending machines Japan has the largest number of vending machines per capita, somewhere around one machine for every 23 people. The majority of these vending machines sell drinks hot drinks in the winter; cold drinks in the summer and sit in well-trafficked areas. We are able to survive easily enough just relying on busses and trains. The bus stop near our apartment can take us all around the ward and trains come every seven minutes. Drinking in public is legal In some countries, it is illegal to consume alcohol in public streets, trains, parks, etc. Japan is not one of those countries. You still need to be careful. However, I have never been approached or harassed by a stranger while walking home at night “ which happened regularly when I lived in Texas and Philadelphia. The complete convenience of convenience stores Convenience stores really are convenient in Japan. You can pay your bills, withdraw money, buy a freshly prepared lunch, and pick up emergency beauty supplies in less than five minutes. In large cities, convenience stores are on basically every corner and in the countryside, convenience stores are placed strategically. Recycling is actually practiced Recycling can be a hassle, of course, but it is nice to live in a country where people actually recycle rather than just tossing everything in the trash. Heated toilet seats Heated toilet seats are a beautiful, magical thing that should be adopted in more countries. They run hot water under the lid so it is less painful going to the bathroom during the freezing winter months. My husband and I both prefer the countryside. There are little pockets of nature parks, temples, trees, etc hidden between buildings. The key is knowing where to look. You can get by ish without speaking the language Of course, I recommend learning Japanese. However, if you are just going to be placed in Osaka for six months, you can get by using only English. Sanitation and general cleanliness Most of the large cities in Japan are surprisingly clean. Rather than throwing trash on the ground, most people take it home and recycle it. Delicious and healthy food Sushi, ramen, okonomiyaki, nabe, mochi, udon “ I could entertain you for hours with stories of my favorite foods in Japan. Food makes a big difference. What are your favorite things about living in Japan?

Country of the Week Switzerland. With its 8,, people, Switzerland is the 95th largest country in the world by population. It is the th largest country in the world by area with 41, square kilometers.

When I ended up moving to Japan again at 22, I quickly fell in love all over. But the best part? There my school would put me up in a cozy mountain lodge and give me some extra money for the inconvenience. Because, you know, spending a few days a month at a monkey-inhabited mountain paradise was SUPER inconvenient. It was a shame, because Tanegashima deserved to be loved. People seemed to be constantly watching me or I was constantly paranoid and it became normal for me to meet someone for the first time and have them tell me that they had recently seen me in the supermarket. When it came time to renew my contract in February I decided to stay, partly because the job paid well and the cost of living in Japan or at least on Tanegashima was quite low, but mostly because I felt like I needed more time to find my feet in Japan. And then the tsunami hit. Tanegashima was far south enough that we had several hours warning, and in the end the wave had lost its force by the time it arrived. Except it was a huge deal. This was when I finally felt the full brunt of being an outsider in Japan. No one wanted to talk about the tsunami with me, and whenever I brought it up they would once again ask me to tell everyone in America that I was fine and the nuclear problems were not as big of a deal as Western media was making them out to be. I have vague memories of some of our neighbors stumbling out of their homes covered in blood and my father going to help dig out bodies, but most of my memories of the earthquake were actually really pleasant. But this time I could. Staring at the water that had just taken so many lives, it took me a full month before I was able to get through the minute drive without pulling over in tears. Thinking about the tsunami somehow made me feel even more alone on the tiny island, and instead of feeling closer to the other people there I felt shut out. My second year in Japan was better. I could communicate more easily in Japanese and made some real friends, particularly a new English teacher who was my age and also a dancer. But I also have friends who taught in Japan and absolutely loved it! I also tried too hard to fit in and act Japanese, which always left me frustrated when I failed. I wish I had done the latter. It made for a lot of awkward situations, and continued confirmations that everyone thought I was basically a different species. Is anyone still reading this? Probably only my mother thanks, Mamma, hope you have fun in Boston this weekend! On the bright side, my two years in Japan gave me the means to travel for the past two and a half years.

You might feel like an outsider more often than not. Life as a foreigner in Japan can be hard sometimes. This is hard enough to deal with for most of us. Some manage better than others, but it is and always will be a problem foreigners in Japan have to face! How do foreigners born in Japan feel? Thus, foreigners born in Japan are not Japanese citizens. As a consequence they cannot vote, for example. This might sound weird to most of us. If both of your parents are foreign, you are not a citizen of Japan, even if you were born there. It is possible to obtain Japanese citizenship as a foreigner. Even you and me can get it! This is a bit complicated and it would go too far to explain the details. There are a few disadvantages if you want to become a Japanese citizen, though. One of the biggest is that you have to abandon your other citizenship. Probably the most well-known person to the English-speaking blogger world is Debito Arudou. They surely looked different and it was the first time I realized that they might have just as many problems as most of us foreigners here in Japan. Apparently she had no Japanese blood running through her veins, yet she was born and raised in Japan. Her parents both American moved to Japan before she was born. She speaks English and Japanese fluently. Yet I think Japan still has a lot to work on! Sometimes when Japanese people have the typical small talk with me I like to experiment a bit: Do you know it? Oh, are you maybe a half? I mean where were you born? Are your parents French? Your Japanese is really good. When did you come to Japan? A lot of Japanese seem to be unable to imagine that a foreign person was born and raised in Japan. A foreigner will never be Japanese in their eyes. Judging by your looks? Maybe you can see how complicated life can be as a foreigner in Japan and all the more for foreigners born in Japan. But how about all the others? Japan needs to change Japan is an island. It has been isolated for a very long time. What do you think? Does Japan need to change? Are you a foreigner born in Japan or do you know anybody like that? How do you feel about it?

Japanese Language Lessons, Tips, and Other Fun Stuff About Japan and sometimes stuff about sharks, too. Detailed instructions on how to move to Japan from the USA, whether it be to teach English or to live permanently.

But what about the flip side of the coin? Tourists and exchange students usually have plenty of tales to tell about these folks, and they truly are the salt of the earth. In fact, long-time foreigners are wary of spending too much time standing still and spacing out in public in case a Helpful Hito mistakes them for a traveller in need and asks them if they need directions it can get embarrassing if you were just contemplating what to have for dinner, or killing time until a friend arrives. The Gaijin Hunter I think we all knew this one was coming at some point. The phenomenon of the Gaijin Hunter is one that almost every foreigner who has lived in Japan will be familiar with. In fact, quite a lot of people who have spent an extended period of time here will attest to having met, and possibly having even been ensnared by, at least one Gaijin Hunter. On the arm of or with your arm around a GH, you become nothing more than gaijin arm candy to be shown off in public. Then, one night at a work night out, they open their mouth and a torrent of grammatically perfect, flawlessly pronounced English gushes forth. Your work buddy, who has patiently sat through months of your garbled attempts to not totally butcher the Japanese language, is actually fluent in English and once spent a few years living overseas! These International Ninjas conceal their worldly knowledge often for a variety of reasons, which might include not wanting to stand out or wanting to avoid looking like a show-off. Some English teachers who work as ALTs in Japanese schools notice this phenomenon when they have kikokushijo returnee students in their classes. Despite having lived abroad with their parents and subsequently learning to speak fluent English, these kids tend to hide their abilities or goof off in English lessons to avoid standing out in front of their classmates which is kind of a shame, when you think about it. Whatever their motivation, the International Ninja will usually reveal themselves at some point, although it might take a bucket of beer or the forging of a close friendship to get them to drop their ninja disguise and talk American TV shows with you. The Wannabe Westerner We love it when Japanese people are interested in foreign countries and cultures, especially if they happen to be interested in our specific country and culture. They frequent gaijin bars and sometimes morph into Gaijin Hunters , and frequently talk about how Japanese society is rigid and unyielding. The English Vampire is a person who cold-approaches foreigners they spot out and about for impromptu English practice. Their intentions are benign enough – they simply want an opportunity to test out their English, and you are the lucky foreigner selected for the task. Unfortunately, English Vampires can be a little blind to the fact that not every foreigner walking around is dying to stop and chat in English. The Gaijin Reminder Perhaps this one is just an inevitable result of being a very visible minority in a very homogeneous nation. The people who immediately hand you a knife and fork and whip away your chopsticks in a restaurant. Some of this, admittedly, is perfectly innocent and goes back to the Helpful Hito, who would rather accommodate you in your foreign language than subject you to the struggle of trying to speak Japanese. The problem is that this mindset ignores the fact that many foreigners can, in fact, speak Japanese and understand the intricacies of Japanese society. By-and-large, the reverse is often true especially for tourists passing through , but treating everyone as a clueless tourist does a disservice to those who have actually studied hard and attempted to integrate into society. Perhaps we should try to appreciate the sentiment behind this over-accommodating behaviour rather than taking it as a personal affront and source of irritation. Read more stories from RocketNews

The long answer is more rambling and incoherent. Well, for starters, Japanese is one of the hardest languages for Americans to learn , requiring 2, hours of study if you want to be considered truly proficient. This is partly because of the difficulties of learning a new language as an adult, and partly because English and Japanese have about as much in common with each other as Halloween and Halloween III. That being said, once you actually got the whole language thing down, you might expect to finally be able to integrate yourself into Japanese society and thrive, right? My name is Vanillaface McCheeseburger! No matter what you do to try and fit in, you will always stick out like a sore thumb in a room full of people who have had their thumbs removed by rototillers. In most cases, these are people who were born in Japan, have Japanese names and speak almost exclusively Japanese, but because of their Korean lineage, they are still legally considered foreigners and as such face several restrictions such as the inability to vote or hold management positions in the public sector, a law that the Supreme Court actually upheld in The government literally decided that all Koreans are dastardly shitheads who are not to be trusted and mandated it to the entire country. Japan is the patron saint of the Internet -- everything is either batshit crazy or adorable or both , with the sole requirement of being impossible to explain in any conceivable context. Amazingly, this has never aired on network television. Well, they do exist, but they were outlawed nearly 20 years ago. You can still find one from time to time, but they are illegal as fuck and usually hidden in sex stores or fetish clubs, and not in a bus station next to the Mr. There is shockingly little anime on television, and most of it is unapologetically meant for children. The only adults who really get into it referred to as otaku are usually perceived by the media as overweight, unwashed weirdos who are probably child molesters. Because if you step off the plane armed with nothing but what the Internet teaches you about this country, chances are you will be arrested before you make it out of the airport. Nightmarish villains with superhuman enhancements. An all-seeing social network that tracks your every move. A young woman from the trailer park and her very smelly cat.
