May 15, Susan rated it liked it Why am I obsessed with books about marriage? Two big reasons marriages fail: Women seem to be more interested in people and feelings, while men are more preoccupied with subjects and things that can be discussed via logic and reasoning. He somehow remains apart. We might explain this difference by comparing a man to a paintbrush and a woman to the paint. Though the brush touches the entire canvas, it finally comes to rest of the pallet. The paint, on the other hand, enters into a oneness with the canvas and can only be separated from it at great cost. He can logically deduce the benefits of a change and get psyched up for it in a matter of minutes. Not so with a woman. Since she focuses on immediate consequences of a change, she needs time to overcome the initial adjustment before warming up to the advantages of it. Our thought processes are different; we live in a different world. So we ask you to help us learn by telling us your needs in a gentle, loving way. But after the wedding, he feels he has conquered her. She is his emotionally and legally. The husband may say to himself, "I have my wife. Now, I need to conquer my business or I need to become a better hunter or we need to begin a family. In a very real sense, a man is filled up when he marries because his wife is now a part of him. He has experienced knowing her in every way -- spiritually, emotionally, mentally and physically. He may feel there is nothing left to know about her. He is satisfied and therefore, has a natural tendency to look for other potential "frontiers" almost immediately following marriage.
