

Chapter 1 : Paul Goble - Wikipedia

Iktomi loses his eyes' author is Paul Goble who is a Caldecott awards owner. The theme of this book should be we have to be honest and keep our promise. I think this is really important for young kids.

Mission Review Chapter Text Barnes takes the building at its word, and as he walks away from it, the signal remains strong in his ears. He walks south, and the signs of the ugly aliens are all around, even 2 years later: Some are still derelict, piles of concrete and twisted metal. Rogers putting himself in the way of every possible harm, with just the people in weird suits and the redhead for backup. It would be good for an alien lizard-thing to show up right now. So he could punch through its face. The coffee bar sounds extensive. It is a memory with an associated physical response: His own shoulder lifts in response. Babe can we get dinner from Momofuku? Steve, do you like Japanese? Will you join us for dinner? That would be great. Her loss, because the gym sounds great: His new friend Building: This is really opulent. I have a new life goal. The streets are lit up now, and less busy than earlier. He walks into a small, dim room crowded with tables, all of which are currently empty. Barnes has a preference. He would choose to sit at this nice table by the door, with his back to the wall and the exits clearly visible. But the old man waves so vigorously that shoulder dislocation is possible. Barnes sits at the counter across from the old man. The counter is glass: That could bear closer inspection. Just tell me what you want. The hamachi is good today. He looks down at the fish in the case. Looks nice sitting on the ice. Does not look edible. They stare at each other briefly. It is weird that future people find raw fish so important. The old man sighs heavily and shakes his head. He comes back to Barnes and uses a little wooden dipper to fill two tiny ceramic cups from a pot on a warmer behind him. He thunks one of the cups down in front of Barnes. Rice wine, to warm you up. He glares at the old man, who rolls his eyes and holds his own cup out. He jiggles the cup. He jiggles it again. The old man drinks the whole little cup at once. Likelihood of poison toleration scheme in a public restaurant: The stuff also tastes a little dusty, and sour, but it goes down warm and leaves behind a pleasant grain-ish flavor. While Barnes drinks, the man is busy behind the counter, piling rice and vegetables on a square of green paper that he rolls up and slices. He puts them on a dish and placed it on the counter. But this is a harmless order. Barnes chooses to follow it. The sushi-thing is good. Parts are soft and parts crunchy. The paper is chewy, but edible. The vegetables have a tang of vinegar. Insufficient caloric value for hard missions, but good to eat. The old man smiles in a mass of wrinkles. It smells like the ocean. Tastes like the ocean, salt and iodine. A woman brings him a large bowl filled with broth, noodles, vegetables, and unknown objects. It takes him two tries to pick up the largest object in the soup using the sticks, but then it makes sense. The thing is a shrimp. But the soup is almost as good as grilled cheese. Complicated, but for once a good kind of complicated.

Chapter 2 : Iktomi Loses His Eyes by Paul Goble | Scholastic

Iktomi quickly breaks the rules of the game, of course, and loses his eyes. The trickster then manages to persuade the mouse and buffalo to donate an eye apiece to Iktomi. Therein ensues some hilarious escapades that will delight the young reader and bring a smile to the adult.
