Amy Rossomondo, associate professor and director of the Spanish language program at the University of Kansas. Gillian Lord, professor of Spanish at the University of Florida. LingroLearning , a foreign language educational technology company. In , Rossomondo and Lord, who had interacted briefly at conferences but never worked together, got separate phone calls from the foreign language team at one of the major publishing companies. The most conventional option was to write a textbook in print and then translate it online. Rossomondo and Lord wanted something more dynamic. The other end of the spectrum would be a computer program like Rosetta Stone, which allows students to be self-sufficient and eliminates the instructor. Neither appealed to Rossomondo and Lord, who spent much of the early years of the project thinking about how to advance foreign language instruction into the modern age. The development process was challenging. Another idea involved asking students to answer questions about a video. Language learning textbooks tend to be formulaic, Lord said. Instead, they reconnected with some of their former publisher collaborators, who had left the company to start a new venture, LingroLearning, that combines digital technology and foreign language instruction. Rossomondo estimates the team tested the product with more than 40 colleagues before it reached its final form. They also wanted to capture students who might be skeptical of the value of foreign language instruction, by connecting the material they were learning to real-world situations. On the other hand, the tech partners warmed to some of their more idiosyncratic ideas, like a diagram of a mouth moving to form a letter or syllable. Rossomondo and Lord called everyone they knew to ask if they were interested in using the platform at no cost to them. The program allows instructors to teach in a flipped format, with didactic language learning happening online and dynamic conversation taking place in the classroom. Students are required to produce videos at the end of each lesson demonstrating their mastery of the material. Those videos get posted to an online portfolio outfitted with the ability to like and comment on posts. Some lessons proceed in a "choose-your-own-adventure" format, with several different possible outcomes.
