It then introduces a second rule set to your trade management, seeking the biggest profit from each winning position. To brush up, read: Four Common Active Trading Strategies. Edgeless Strategies A quick reality check will tell you if your trading strategy has a definable edge. List the most common methods you use to find new opportunities, entry and exit positions and manage risk. Then try to remember where you learned those specific concepts, whether from a book, web site or another trader. Finally, consider how many other market participants are playing the exact same strategies, often at the exact same time. Secondly, crowds attract unwanted attention from other traders who notice the liquidity pool and execute predatory strategies to shake out weak hands. The sheer number of participants acting in the same way eliminates the edge that made those strategies work in the first place. In fact, edgeless strategies popularized in books and websites work really well as building blocks for more powerful techniques that will retain their edges through a lifetime. Temporal Edges Markets change all the time, creating and destroying trading edges that tap into the complexities of the current cycle. The trick with these temporal edges is to work them aggressively until the crowd shows up, and then back off, utilizing them only when other folks are leaning the wrong way. Regulations and technology also give way to temporal edges, with the rise of high-frequency trading HFT as a strong example. Prior generations enjoyed similar edges with bullet trading and Level II scalping. Creating Your Own Edge Like edgeless concepts found in books and websites, temporal edges provide a foundation for more powerful strategies. The more cross verification points we uncover, the higher the odds that level will act as intended in stopping a decline and triggering a bounce. Fore related reading, see: The rally stalled at a 6-year high near 78 and settled into a rectangle pattern above new support. The fund broke down nearly three weeks later, penetrating new support but not breaking it, providing the first verification point for our strategy. To learn more, see: That level also marks the. Finally, the decline settles near the minute bar EMA, a classic turning point for pullbacks in uptrends. Price structure and seasonality raise odds even further for our specialized dip trade. Seasonality comes into play because the breakdown happens during options expiration, dropping the fund into the popular 75 strike, forcing the pool of open interest into worthless positions. Incorporating Seasonality Into The Trading Day Now we apply our edge to finding a fruitful exit, hopefully using the crowd to our advantage once again. Two potential exit points appear, one at the prior high near 79 and a second at the rising highs trendline near Our tape reading skills now come into play because price settles into a bullish 60 minute consolidation that lasts for 8 hours black rectangle on 60 minute chart. The lack of selling pressure emboldens us to play for the higher exit, which has three advantages. First, it will hit 80, a natural open interest target during expiration. Second, it will push out the top Bollinger Band , setting off a common sell signal. Third, it will reach resistance after a small scale breakout encourages a new crowd to take risk. We ride their greed into the magic number, taking a sizable profit while predators line up to feed on the newly minted bulls. The Bottom Line A trading edge defines your technical or strategic advantage in the highly competitive market environment. Traders can establish multiple edges by starting with popular strategies and customizing rules to lower the risk of getting trapped with the emotional crowd.
