Public Health Service inspection card. Island of despair By Jeff Favre July 30, 0 Tyrus Wong still recalls the troubling time he spent in an interrogation room inside the Angel Island Immigration Station in the early s. Wong was released from this West Coast center after two weeks. He was one of , Chinese immigrants who passed through the island facility in the heart of San Francisco Bay. It was in operation from to Seventy years after Angel Island closed, the debate over U. The issue is particularly contentious in Arizona, which this year passed a controversial new law that would, among things, require immigrants to carry documentation or risk being deported. If confronted and asked, those without such proof would be arrested and deported. Nearly years later, we are seeing a similar reincarnation of this law in Arizona. The museum is open from 10 a. They asked personal questions of family members to see if their stories matched. The interrogations were designed to fail most everyone, whether or not their family claims were legitimate. And your answers would have to match, or you could be sent back. The desk includes a drawer with case files, showing how detailed the investigations were for each immigrant. Though interrogation is the centerpiece, Troung explained, he wanted to take everyone through the entire process, from arriving by ship and being inspected there are photos of medical checkups and personal medical ID cards to detention and departure. It provides a re-creation of the entire process. Angel Island closed its doors in after a fire. Interrogations and detentions continued in other locations for more than two decades. Part of the renovation included saving much of the poetry that was carved in the walls by detainees. One poem has been replicated for the exhibition, carved in Chinese, with the following English translation: The inmates often sigh. Thinking of affairs back home, unconscious tears wet my lapel.

They now live on another island, dependent on American food and support. They can never go back to Bikini Atoll because it is poisoned beyond the possibility of habitation. This film is a poignant, impressive study of a people whose culture has been vanquished. The Human Face of the Pacific This series is composed of six documentaries covering six Pacific nations and territories, giving a wide-ranging view of contemporary Pacific society. A Film Australia production in association with Cinema Enterprises. Geographical knowledge and understanding For Geography students this Digital Resource provides a case study in the human impact on the natural environment. The natural environment is the island communities of the Marshall Islands. The human impact of atomic testing in the s has impacted on the physical and human environment of Bikini Atoll. Through further exploring the nature of island and coastal communities, students understand the fragility of such natural systems and the impact of human activities. Strategies to address the issue are discussed. Interdisciplinary Learning " Thinking " students explore different perspectives in depth and identify a range of creative possibilities. This material is an extract. Teachers and Students should consult the Victoria Curriculum and Assessment Authority website for more information. Kilon, an elderly member of the Bikini community, believes his people may have been tricked into leaving the atoll in the s so the United States could conduct these tests. Following a series of unhappy relocation efforts beginning in , the Bikinians were told in the early 70s that it was safe to return to their atoll. Subsequent medical tests found they had dangerous levels of radiation in their bodies, and they were evacuated once again in . By the s, the long-term effects of exposure to radiation had become a very contentious issue. US official findings often diverged from the evidence of the Marshall Islanders but it is clear that the many relocations and the dependence on the United States and its imported foods has produced long term ill-health and anxieties in the population. Confined to a new semi-urban environment, Bikinians fear for the future of their children, who are influenced by American cultural values through television and who no longer know their traditional way of life and culture. The Bikinians have petitioned for compensation from the US Government because of the damage done to their island homes and the negative impact it has had on their health, life-style and the future of their children. In , the Nuclear Claims Tribunal determined damages to be paid to Bikinians. There is not enough cash to honour the award and it is left to the Bikinians to petition the US for more money. A decision is expected to take some years. Despite attempts to clean up the contamination, permanent resettlement on Bikini has not been possible. Classroom Activities top Describe the characteristics of the Bikini Atoll before the atomic testing. In your description include landform, vegetation, climate and lifestyle of the Bikinians. What alternatives did the US have at the time to atomic testing? Since the atomic testing life for the Bikinians has changed. Describe this change and present this change as an annotated sketch before and after. Develop a series of questions to ask the Bikini people now as to their way of life. From the video clip, comment on role of US governments towards the community of Bikinians. What do you think the responsibility of governments should be towards people living on the Marshall Islands? Develop a series of questions to ask the US government about the Marshall Islands. Describe the role of the United Nations self-sufficiency agreement. Why has that been set up? How sustainable and economically viable is the situation with the Marshall Islanders being dependent upon a foreign government? Use scenes from this video clip to support your viewpoint.

Their First Two Thousand Years. If you would like to order this book please visit www. These traditionally dressed Wends prepare for Easter with the decorating of eggs. The twentieth century has seen the emigration of numbers of these people to Australia and the United States. Just before Christmas , the sailing vessel Ben Nevis completed a tumultuous, seven-week trans-atlantic journey from Liverpool, England, docking at last at Galveston, Texas. The five hundred passengers, who had survived rough seas and rampant cholera, undoubtedly said a prayer of thanks before moving on to Houston, the city that many of them eventually called home. To the locals, they probably seemed just another batch of poor German immigrants seeking prosperity. The newcomers were Wends, an ancient but minute people of Slavic origin, seeking a privilege that had eluded them for more than a thousand years: The Wends appear in the earliest historic references to the Slavic peoples, says historian George R. Nielson In Search of a Home , but have been little noticed because they were so few in number, and had never formed an independent state. In the sixth century, they followed westward-moving Germanic tribes into a broad area known as Lusatia, between the Oder and Elbe rivers, stretching from fifty miles southeast of Berlin to the border of the later Czech Republic, and including parts of Poland. But before long the German Franks, anxious to secure the eastern border of their Christian Empire, found themselves confronted there by an entrenched thicket of pagan Saxons and Slavs. Vlasto notes in The Entry of the Slavs into Christendom, the Germans openly coveted the best Slav lands, and the busy, prosperous Slav ports that offered access to the northern Baltic trade route. Initially the Germans merely conducted raids, selling their many Slavic captives as slaves, usually to the Muslims. The actual subjugation of the Lusatian Wends began in the early tenth century. It would take nearly three hundred years to completely subdue, Germanize and Christianize them, a process whose events were engraved in Wend memory. Early in the twentieth century, Jacob Barth, their preeminent poet and a student of theology, wrote: Oh, how appalling was the carnage, Oh, how hellish the slaughter! The gallows resounded with screams and curses As the hounds tore into the masses. The priests, all the while, chanted psalms And litanies and sang hymns. Horrified by the sight of it all, The sun itself took flight. Hrabanus entered into his chronicle while praying on his knees: The Saxons, Vlasto writes, were seemingly determined to subject the pagan Slavs to the same treatment they themselves received from Charlemagne: In , pagan Wends rebelled, razing Hamburg and clearing out the Germans from virtually all territory beyond the Elbe. Although the Germans regained Lusatia in a bloody fifteen-year campaign, for almost two centuries there was continuous strife. In , the Wends bitterly conceded defeat and began a sorrowful period of decline as an impoverished underclass, dispossessed of their property, banned from skilled jobs, required to speak only German. By the early twenty-first century there were fewer than seventy thousand Wends in the entire world, the majority Lutheran and a substantial minority Roman Catholic. While the Wends still consider the town of Bautzen in eastern Germany their capital, only one thousand of its forty-four thousand inhabitants are Wendish, and assimilation is every bit as potent in Texas as Germany. So a Slavic people that has survived epochal persecution now faces a more graceful dissolution through assimilation. It allows you to find monuments of the past in the form of statues, temples, and certain famous locations. Artaxerxes is a blind man who just wants to listen to tales about certain monuments he heard about in his youth. Upon talking to him, as long as your conversation is somewhat civil, he will explain that there are several monuments he wants to hear about. Statue of Zeus On the island of Kephallonia, there is a massive statue in the middle of the island. Climb up this gigantic structure and use the viewpoint to allow you to tell Artaxerxes about it. You should see a towering statue with gold armour. This is the statue you need to climb, so head on upwards towards the viewpoint. When you reach close to the top, your hero will comment on the statue. Temple of Aphrodite Upon reaching Korrinthia, you may notice a massive mountain south of the city that looms over the city. Synchronising with the viewpoint at the top will net you the story to tell Artaxerxes. It is also up a very high point and is essentially a tree with armour plating. Be careful if going into Arcadia as the enemies are relatively highly levelled. If in doubt, use Ikaros and look at the peaks of mountains for the viewpoint. Taygetos Overlook Perhaps this will invoke bitter memories for your hero, but the last location is the Taygetos Overlook, which is a fair bit south-west of Sparta, and the south-west of the Forest of Eurotas region. Climb the mountain and synchronise for the final entry. If you want to celebrate, why not take a leap of faith into the water below? You have a choice to either let him kill Artaxerxes or kill the soldier. Should you kill the soldier, Artaxerxes will thank you by revealing the location of some treasure. Once on dry land, head to the south of the island to the Ruined Sanctuary of Ajax. Note that this is not one of the chests required to complete the local area, so be sure to look very carefully.

Chapter 6 : Bitter Memories by Margaret Mayo

Be the first to ask a question about Bitter Memories Now she is a widower and went to the island of his where her sisters now works. Will the past.

Toyoda and Kurita planned a pincer attack on Leyte Gulf with their battleships. Kurita would take one force, with five battleships, including Yamato and Musashi, through the San Bernardino Strait to hit Leyte Gulf from the north. His son, Teiji Nishimura, a naval aviator, had been killed in the former invasion. On September 10, , Nishimura was given command of Battleship Division 2, which consisted of the dreadnoughts Fuso and Yamashiro and their destroyer escorts. The two battlewagons, sister ships, dated back to and were known throughout the fleet for their tall pagoda mastsâ€”44 meters above the waterlineâ€”and for having sat out most of the war in home waters, mostly as training vessels. These battleships had never fired their guns in anger. They were the first battleships built with Japanese engines and guns, the most powerful dreadnoughts in the world at the time. Failed Coordination With the Second Striking Force Studying his war maps, Toyoda did not think that Nishimura had quite enough punch, so he added a second task force to the southern wing, under Vice Admiral Kiyohide Shima, swinging down from the Pescadore Islands off Formosa. Unlike Nishimura, Shima was a desk sailor. He had served in a variety of shore posts, mostly in communications. Neither force commander coordinated his movements with the otherâ€”nor were any orders given to do so. As far as historians could tell, Nishimura was to clear a path with his battleships so that the cruisers and destroyers behind could finish off the transports with torpedoes. With the Americans moving on Leyte, the Japanese launched their intricate countermoves. On October 20, the Americans invaded Leyte with massive power. Spotted in the Sulu Sea The next day, Kurita summoned his senior officers to a conference on his flagship, the heavy cruiser Atago. If the complex ship movements worked, the two forces would slam into the American 7th Fleet just before dawn on October All through the afternoon and night, the two forces steamed along unimpeded into the Sulu Sea. Kurita shifted his flag to the battleship Yamato and sailed on. A strike group of 12 bombers and 16 fighters headed for the dreadnoughts. For Enterprise Ensign Robert J. The antiaircraft fire was terrific. On Fuso, Yeoman 2nd Class Hideo Ogawa, in the powder magazine, considered that if the battleship were hit his end would be quick, as he was surrounded by main battery powder canisters. The American planes swooped down on the Japanese warships, subjecting them to bombing, strafing, and rockets. On Yamashiro, 20 men died from strafing. A bomb scored a direct hit on Fuso, bouncing No. It crashed through the deck and killed everyone in the secondary battery. Luckily, the Japanese did not spot him, and he spent seven days in a life raft before he was spotted and picked up by the submarine USS Hardhead, dehydrated, hungry, blistered, but otherwise in good shape. He recovered to resume flying. The American planes flew off, and damage control parties on the Japanese ships went to work. Both battlewagons suffered from burst seams and minor damage. Nishimura ordered his ships to proceed with their mission. One of them reported four battleships, two cruisers, four destroyers, 15 aircraft carriers, 14 PT boats, and 80 transports in Leyte Gulf, a close approximation of the defense. At 4 pm, Nishimura blinkered his battle plan. Mogami and the four destroyers would steam ahead and mop up the enemy PT boats, then reassemble, and all ships would charge up Surigao Strait. Rear Admiral Jesse C. Oldendorf was a burly Californian and a member of the Annapolis class of Roosevelt on his voyages. In and , he was in charge of countermeasures in the Caribbean against U-boats and screening big transports on convoy duty. With short notice, Oldendorf planned his defenses with skill. He summoned his subordinate admirals aboard his flagship in the early evening to lay out his plans. He had several advantages: He set up a gauntlet for the Japanese. Then Oldendorf would harry them with destroyers armed with torpedoes. Navy had not shown a good record in night naval engagements up to this point, losing battles or suffering heavy casualties in the Solomons. His destroyers lacked replacement torpedoes. At least two lacked modern radar. They had been doing so for days. Some of the destroyers were down to 20 percent of their ammunition. The battleships were loaded with 77 percent bombardment shells for ground targets and 23 percent armorpiercing ordnance for enemy shipsâ€”and they had been on the bombardment line for days, shooting off 58 percent of all their ammunition. Oldendorf told his battleship men to hold fire until the Japanese had closed to 17, to 20, yards, use armor-piercing shells to rip open the enemy hulls, and high explosive ordnance thereafter. Oldendorf took other precautions. The destroyers and cruisers took up positions on the right and left wings of the battle line to minimize the risk of friendly fire. Their crews were eager to avenge that humiliation. The sixth battleship was the veteran USS Mississippi. Some of the American cruisers were new warships, like Denver, Columbia, and Cleveland, while others trailed lengthy records of combat. Portland had been at Midway, Minneapolis at Guadalcanal, Phoenix had steamed boldly out of the carnage of Pearl Harbor, while Boise survived overwhelming Japanese power in the defeats in the Philippines and Dutch East Indies. With your approval I will submit plan shortly. The Japanese were going in, too. Nishimura intended to hit the American transports at 4 am. The night wore on, with Japanese lookouts peering into the dark as the two forces moved separately through the Mindanao Sea and toward the island of Leyte. There was no wind, a flat sea, and visibility only about three miles. Aboard Louisville, Oldendorf could only see two ships in front of and behind him. Gadd throttled up and closed in to attack, joined by other PT boats. The PT boats headed in to loose torpedoes, and lookouts on Shigure spotted the American vessels. Shigure opened fire and illuminated with starshells. Realizing they were attacking a force many times their power, the PT boats turned away, making smoke to obscure their exits. The battleships joined in with their secondary armament. One 6-inch shell struck a glancing blow right against the forward torpedo in its rack on PT, smashing the nose, splintering the deck. The PT boats reported their contact up the chain of command, and Oldendorf got the messages an hour and a half after the Japanese were sighted. Neither side scored hits, but the scrapping frayed Japanese nerves. Nishimura was afraid that Mogami would mistake him for the enemy in the deteriorating visibility. Sure enough, at 1: Trained in recognizing enemy ships, but not to distinguish Japanese vessels, they reported the silhouette as American. Nishimura ordered his ships to cease fire, and the entire Japanese formation regrouped and resumed heading north with the battleships in the lead and Mogami behind. Shima had no plan to cooperate with Nishimura, merely to follow along. The American PT boats were still harrying the Japanese, though. Wakelin fired torpedoes at Fuso, but they passed harmlessly astern of the battleship. Three more PT boats popped out, and Nishimura had to do some fancy maneuvering to avoid the American fish. PT found itself a bare yards from the Japanese ships and was hit by two shells. PT moved in to evacuate the crew, and the wounded PT drifted free and sank after sunrise. American casualties on the fragile PT boats numbered three killed and 20 wounded. As they did so, another group of PT boats sprinted in from the southeast, hurling six torpedoes at the Japanese. The torpedoes all missed. All hands were served coffee and sandwiches after midnight. At 3 am, the American destroyers loosed 27 torpedoes at a range of 11, yards at the Japanese. As the torpedoes powered through the water, Fuso opened up with her inch guns at a surface target for the first time in her life. Petty Officer Hideo Ogawa removed cordite charges from flash-proof storage canisters and loaded them onto the powder-cage elevator, and at 3: Japanese shells flew at the American destroyers. The dreadnought slowed down and began listing to starboard. The starboard boiler rooms flooded rapidly. The dreadnought sheered out of line, her starboard side blazing. Incredibly, her skipper, Rear Admiral Masami Ban, did not radio a damage reportâ€”he may have been unable to do so or coping with too many crises at onceâ€”and her companions continued steaming north. Mogami slipped into the position Fuso vacated. Nishimura was unaware that he had just lost 50 percent of his dreadnought strength and pressed on, radioing orders to an unresponsive Fuso. The destruction was only beginning. A startling vibration shook up Chief Engineer Tokichi Ishii. He phoned the bridge to find out what was going on but got no answer. Seconds later, a runner from the bridge appeared bearing word from the skipper, Commander Kazuo Shibayama, to check on a torpedo hit to the port bow. At the same time, torpedoes smacked into Asagumo.
