Jack Kent's Fables of Aesop has 8 ratings and 2 reviews. Melki said: Some old familiar adages here - Don't count your chickens before they're hatched, Be.

I suppose we all live our lives by such homilies, but I was really amazed at how much of this particular book is part and parcel of my psyche. Like so many books I read in my tender years, this is one of those that really stuck in my head and made me who I am today, I think. Each story was familiar to me upon re-reading it, and the morals even more familiar. But the moral and ethical ideas are still there. I wonder if Aesop is taught? It should be - in school and in Sunday School too. These are really conservative in nature too - does that make me a conservative at heart? A fox steals a sheep, which is in turn stolen from him by a lion. He bitches about it, and the lion says "Belongs to you, does it? It was given to you by a friend, I suppose. Gays on a Bike The Man and the Satyr. A man and a satyr are on a tandem bicycle, which I think it so gay. The man blows his hands to warm them, then blows on his soup to cool it. The satyr says "I want nothing to do with anyone who can blow hot and cold with the same breath. But I immediately think of the phrase: The Hare and the Tortoise. I discussed this one in a previous blog post. Vernon-Jones from around the turn of the last century. A politically correct change, perhaps? The Hare and the Hound. A dog chases a hare for a while, then gives up. The goatherd mocks him - "The little one is a better runner! I was only running for a dinner, but he was running for his life. Sometimes you have to give up on something. The hare wanted it more, and the hound eventually knew it. The Fox and the Crane. The crane turns around and does the same thing to the fox. Be a thoughtful host. Turn about is fair play. I wonder if they found new friends after this? The Crow and the Pitcher. I think they are hazelnuts. When he asks them for help, they say to him: Make hay while the sun shines. Actually, the grasshopper was working all summer long. He was entertaining the ants while they worked. He deserves some compensation! This is probably one of the fables where moral relativism can swoop in and make a mess of things. You can also tell from this fable that Aesop was no Christian. Some of his homilies can sound vaguely Christian, but Jesus would have whipped up some fishes and loaves and fed the grasshopper regardless of what he did all summer. A lesson Republicans seems to have forgotten. The Lion and the Mouse. Another famous tale, about the mouse who helps out a lion. The Cat and Venus. A cat falls in love with a man, and asks Venus to turn her into a human. The goddess does, the young man and can now beautiful human woman fall in love and get married. Also, you may want to do a little investigating about a potential mate before marrying them. And love is fickle. Venus is a bitch. If the young man loves his wife, who cares if she chases mice? The Bear and the Two Travelers. Two hobos comes face to face with a bear. One runs off and climbs a tree; the other plays dead. His companion later asks what the bear said. Misfortune tests the sincerity of friends. Then, once again, fuck off. The North Wind and the Sun. The sun and the north wind argue about who can strip "a wayfaring man of his clothes. The sun warms the man up, and he strips down. Mice decide to bell the cat - a great idea, but someone asks the question "But which of us is going to do it. A farm wagon rumbles down the road, stirring up clouds of dust. Two thousand years ago, Aesop was telling these stories, and they still ring true today. Completely wonderful book - part of my soul is built on these lessons from antiquity with s illustrations.
