History[edit] The area was long settled by various cultures of indigenous peoples. After European colonization began on the East Coast, pressure from settlement and other Native American tribes caused various peoples to migrate into the area. By the mid-19th century, four Dakota language-speaking divisions of the Dakota Sioux were the primary indigenous group. Henry Jackson, one of the pioneers of Mankato, served as the first Justice of the Peace in St. Paul, first Postmaster of St. Paul in 1849, and a member of the first Territorial Assembly. New residents organized the city of Mankato on May 11. A popular story says that the city was supposed to have been named Mahkato, but a typographical error by a clerk established the name as Mankato. No more appropriate name could be given the new city, than that of the noble river at whose mouth it is located. The Anglo settlers adapted that as "Blue Earth River". Ishtakhaba, also known as Chief Sleepy Eye, of the Sisseton band of Dakota Indians, was said to have directed settlers to this location. He said the site at the confluence of the Minnesota and Blue Earth Rivers was well suited to building and river traffic, and yet safe from flooding. Thirty-eight Dakota Native Americans were hanged for their parts in the uprising. A military tribunal had sentenced them to death, but President Lincoln reviewed the record and pardoned them, believing they had been involved in legitimate defense against military forces. Two commemorative statues stand on the site of the hangings now home to the Blue Earth County Library and Reconciliation Park. In 1856, Mankato ranked fourth in size in the state. The population was 5, Lewis describes Mankato as follows: Lewis wrote a substantial portion of the novel while staying at the J. Schmidt House at South Broad Street, as now marked by a small plaque in front of the building. It does not appear in the Laura Ingalls Wilder books. This section does not cite any sources. May Learn how and when to remove this template message Mankato has a humid continental climate, type Dfa hot summer subtype. Winters are cold, with snow cover continuous most winter seasons beginning typically between mid-November and mid-December, ending in March most years. However, Mankato often receives less snow than areas to its north and east. For example, Minneapolis, 75 miles northeast of Mankato, averages over 54 inches or 1. A significant hazard during winter is dangerously low wind-chill temperatures, as Arctic air outbreaks rush into the area from Canada, borne on high winds; this can bring ground blizzard conditions, especially in nearby rural areas. Summers are warm, with occasional but usually brief hot, humid periods, often interspersed with pushes of cooler air from Canada, often preceded by showers and thunderstorms. Precipitation falls year round, but falls mostly as snow from December to February, sometimes March, and as showers and thunderstorms during the warmer season, from May to September. The highest-risk months for severe thunderstorms and rarely tornadoes, are May through July. However, a very unusual early tornado outbreak affected areas within 20 miles of Mankato on March 29, 1913, when an F3 tornado hit St. Climate data for Mankato, Minnesota Month.
