Trade Reviews "This is a readable and enjoyable biography that enlightens us, telling the story with energy, rhythm and clarity. Right away, we know we are being let in on a great story of a man who shaped so much of our world today, offering us a window into who we are now and how we got here, recognizing our values, and our establishments. This is an important new history, as it has not been written before, and a singular work. An Eminent New Yorker in the Gilded Age is the captivating biography about the life and times of a man who shaped the history of New York in the early 20th century. An attorney, philanthropist, and reformer, Parsons held a position of respect among such Empire State barons as Rockefeller and Carnegie, helped establish institutions that became the Cooper Union for the Advancement of Science and Art and the Memorial Sloan Kettering Cancer Center, and contributed to amending the city? When not performing his civic duties, Parsons enjoyed the country life in his home in Lenox, Massachusetts, where his generosity made him a beloved member of the Berkshire Hills community. But despite his charitable works, Parsons? The dramatic story of how he endured the protracted trial and publicity is a poignant testament to his strength of character and the widespread admiration in which he was held. I am a financial economist working in the area of financial risk management, corporate finance and valuation. While I have applied these tools to a wide array of different industries, I have the most experience in the energy industry and on environmental problems. It is an exciting group of faculty and students doing path breaking research, and a great place to learn more and dig deeper into the discipline of financial economics. I have also participated in teaching specialized courses on financing energy and related topics. CEEPR promotes rigorous and objective empirical research at MIT on issues related to energy and environmental policy to support decision-making by government and industry. The results of the research are disseminated through publications, workshops, educational programs and other public outreach activities. The relevance and validity of the research is enhanced through cooperation with government and industry associates in countries around the globe. CEEPR gave me my first engagement in applied financial economics in the mids when I was pulled in to a major study on the evolution of the international natural gas markets and asked to analyze the role of contracts in financing the development of new natural gas fields and LNG projects. In subsequent years, CEEPR underwrote a series of my studies in the application of corporate finance to practical problems in financing energy investments. Over the years, I stayed in touch, and in they brought me back as the Executive Director. Most courses on derivatives, futures and options, and financial engineering are taught from the viewpoint of investment bankers and traders in the securities. This course is taught from the point of view of the manufacturing corporation, the utility, the software firm—any potential end-user of derivatives, but not the dealer. Most related courses focus on the extensive taxonomy of instruments and the complex models developed to price them, and on ways to exploit mispricing. While this course will make use of some of these pricing models, the focus is on how corporations use the insights and models to improve their operations, to increase the value of their real assets, or to create the financial flexibility necessary to implement their core strategy. I developed this course over many years, combining my academic training together with my 10 years of experience as a full-time consultant for businesses faced with various risk management problems. Two things struck me while attempting to apply academic models in the real world: My return to MIT from consulting has given me the opportunity one never gets in the business world to try to write down the lessons I learned and to produce a different systematization of how the academic models are employed. I think it is a novel presentation of the material that I think is very useful. My long-time collaborator, Professor Antonio Mello of Imperial College, London, has co-authored with me the lecture notes that are the core of this course. These lecture notes will be available sometime in the future.
