Feb 04, Â· Judge James L. Robart did not have to actually rule on the legality of President Trump's executive order barring people from seven countries from entering the United States. In granting a.

Having read most if not all of her anthologies, this certainly caught my attention. On reflection having read this, I would have to agree â€” here we have an anthology where every single story is heart-breaking or grim or absurdly strange and wonderful, and all are incredibly read-able. FableCroft are going from strength to strength with each anthology better than the last â€” which is saying something. What a way to start an anthology! This is an incredibly strange, magical and wonderful story of a town where things grow on trees, such as pencils and car tyres. Glass flowers sprout from the security cameras the Councilmen install which is really beautiful imagery, I love it! The world is probably the most interesting part of this strange tale, leaving you wanting more. Who wants a novel using this idea? I know I do! Oil and Bone by Dan Rabarts Set in New Zealand, Anaru and Piripi are escorting Englishman Clark through the Southern Alps to make some money on the side of a journey they have to make anyway â€” to retrieve something that was stolen from them. This piece has very beautiful imagery and a very, very satisfying ending. Collateral Damage by Dirk Flinthart In a world where military actions have been completely monetised, done strictly by contract, Mariko has now left her previous position of being head of a mercenary company in favour of forming a brokerage with a plan to bring down the now-corrupt brokerage system entirely. This is quite a fun piece, whilst being technical and deep in the world of war and the complex systems that make it all possible. When he comes to he discovers his attacker is a giant, sent by a scary woman who knows exactly who Horatio truly is. We see the beauty and brutality of Heaven, we see a diverse cast with an intensely developed backstory for a short story, and wow, what an ending. This is easily one of my favourite pieces in this anthology. Parmesh is driven to distraction by it, but Meleiana, pilot of the Zhang He, seems to think it can all be explained. It really packs a punch, and really leaves you thinking. This is quite an engaging story, though I would have liked to see more of the character Belane. The ending especially works well; this is a well measured short story that delivers well. Circa by Caitlene Cooke Circa is a time-traveller â€” not much more needs to be said to explain why this short is particularly excellent. It also shows what happens if someone is dragged through time â€” spoiler alert: This piece is packed full of action and quick-thinking, as Circa has to figure out a way to save herself or if not that, make the best of a bad situation. This is complicated and timey-wimey and pretty dang-excellent. Living in the Light by Sara Lerner Another excellent beginning that makes it impossible not to read on: He was a premature birth, so I expected some complications. This piece is written with a sort of distance, and you get the feel of the mother taking a step back to try to understand what on earth is happening here. You become transfixed by the pace of what becomes normal for her, and then increasing as sometime as simple as a night-light going out spells something much more significant. The ending packs a punch like so many others in this anthology, but for this one my mouth dropped open as it all fell into place. Always Another Point by Alexis Hunter Jenna is trapped on a ship, suffering double miseries and on the run. Another piece where the less said about the plot in this review means better reading for you on your first read of this anthology. You can only read on with sympathy for this one, hoping she gets out okay and gets a chance to heal â€” from more than one heartache. This piece parallels many issues and discrimination we have in the world today, and is also incredibly sad. However, it also ends in hope. This is a complex piece that involves the goddess Ishtar and deals with the surreal. Salvatrix by Marianne de Pierres Ralph is a shearer, who sometimes works for a place rumoured to lock up the mistress when the Governor is away. This is written with an easy hand, capturing the lingo used of the time such as slang for the cigarettes and lifestyle, smoothly weaving this all together into something a bit mystical and fantastic. This has got miles and miles to discover through it, and another one of my absolute favourites in an already-strong and fantastic anthology. Then Hana discovers something wonderful. This is short and sweet, strong and well written.
