Is Kidnapping a Federal Crime? PC California Penal Code Section defines kidnapping as when you take, detain, hold, or arrest another person and bring that person to another county, state, country, or another part of the same county using force or fear. So, if kidnapping involves taking a person across state or international lines, could it be a federal crime? Federal Kidnapping Charges 18 U. Section Kidnapping is typically charged at the state level because cases often involve moving a person within the one state. However, kidnapping could be charged as a federal crime if the defendant is alleged to have crossed state or international lines. Section , kidnapping is when a person unlawfully seizes, abducts, or carries away and holds another person for ransom or reward across state lines. It also states that failing to release a victim within 24 hours after they have been kidnapped creates an assumption they have been transported in interstate or foreign commerce. Penalties for Kidnapping Kidnapping is a serious crime in California. If you are convicted of federal kidnapping under 18 U. Section , you face 20 years to life in prison, depending on your prior convictions and the circumstances of your case. If the kidnapping results in the death of a person, you could face life in prison or the death penalty. Federal kidnapping charges involving minors are sentenced differently. You could face at least 20 years in prison if: The victim of the kidnapping is under the age of 18, You are 18 years old or older, AND You are not the parent, grandparent, sibling, aunt, uncle or any individual with legal custody of the victim Kidnapping often involves a parent or someone related to the alleged victim taking the minor child away from the custody of the other parent or legal guardian. International parental kidnapping is a separate federal crime under 18 U. You violate this law if you have parental rights over a child under 16 years of age and you take that child outside of the United States. You face up to three years in prison if you are convicted under 18 U. That is why you need to speak to an experienced criminal defense attorney immediately. We may be able to help you avoid the harsh consequences of a kidnapping conviction. We will get through this together. K is for Kidnapped Children. When an Alabama boy was taken from his school bus last month and held hostage, it made national news. It was horrifying and nearly impossible to think that such a

KIDNAPPING The crime of unlawfully seizing and carrying away a person by force or fraud, or seizing and detaining a person against his or her will with an intent to carry that person away at a later time. The law of kidnapping is difficult to define with precision because it varies from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. Most state and federal kidnapping statutes define the term kidnapping vaguely, and courts fill in the details. Generally, kidnapping occurs when a person, without lawful authority, physically asports i. Under the model penal code a set of exemplary criminal rules fashioned by the American Law Institute , kidnapping occurs when any person is unlawfully and non-consensually asported and held for certain purposes. Kidnapping laws in the United States derive from the common law of kidnapping that was developed by courts in England. Originally, the crime of kidnapping was defined as the unlawful and non-consensual transportation of a person from one country to another. In the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, states began to redefine kidnapping, most notably eliminating the requirement of interstate transport. At the federal level, Congress passed the Lindbergh act in to prohibit interstate kidnapping 48 Stat. The Lindbergh Act was named for Charles A. Lindbergh, a celebrated aviator and Air Force colonel whose baby was kidnapped and killed in The act provides that if a victim is not released within 24 hours after being abducted, a court may presume that the victim was transported across state lines. This presumption may be rebutted with evidence to the contrary. Other federal kidnapping statutes prohibit kidnapping in U. A person who is convicted of kidnapping is usually sentenced to prison for a certain number of years. In jurisdictions that authorize the death penalty, a kidnapper is charged with a capital offense if the kidnapping results in death. Kidnapping is so severely punished because it is a dreaded offense. It usually occurs in connection with another criminal offense, or underlying crime. It involves violent deprivation of liberty, and it requires a special criminal boldness. Furthermore, the act of moving a crime victim exposes the victim to risks above and beyond those that are inherent in the underlying crime. Most kidnapping statutes recognize different types and levels of kidnapping and assign punishment accordingly. New York State, for example, bases its definition of first-degree kidnapping on the purpose and length of the abduction. First-degree kidnapping occurs when a person abducts another person to obtain ransom N. First-degree kidnapping also occurs when the abduction lasts for more than 12 hours and the abductor intends to injure the victim; to accomplish or advance the commission of a felony; to terrorize the victim or a third person; or to interfere with a governmental or political function. An abduction that results in death is also first-degree kidnapping. New York State also has a second-degree kidnapping statute. This crime lacks the aggravating circumstances in first-degree kidnapping, and it is ranked as a class B felony. Two key elements are common to all charges of kidnapping. First, the asportation or detention must be unlawful. Under various state and federal statutes, not all seizures and asportations constitute kidnapping: Police officers may arrest and jail a person they suspect of a crime, and parents are allowed to reasonably restrict and control the movement of their children. Second, some aggravating circumstance must accompany the restraint or asportation. This can be a demand for money; a demand for anything of value; an attempt to affect a function of government; an attempt to inflict injury on the abductee; an attempt to terrorize a third party; or an attempt to commit a felony. In most states, kidnapping statutes specify that any unlawful detention or physical movement of a child, other than that performed by a parent or guardian, constitutes kidnapping. An abduction of a child thus need not be accompanied by some other circumstance, such as extortion or physical injury, to qualify for the highest level of kidnapping charge. In the absence of an aggravating circumstance, an unlawful, non-consensual restraint or movement is usually charged as something less than the highest degree or level of kidnapping. Many states have enacted special laws for carjacking, a specialized form of kidnapping. Carjacking is a felony whether the aggressor keeps the victim in the car or forces the victim from the car. Kidnapping laws are similar to laws on unlawful or felonious restraint, parental kidnapping, and false imprisonment. These crimes cover the range of unlawful-movement and unlawful-restraint cases. Felonious or unlawful restraint, also known as simple kidnapping, is the unlawful restraint of a person that exposes the victim to physical harm or places the victim in slavery. It is a lesser form of kidnapping because it does not require restraint for a specified period or specific purpose such as to secure money or commit a felony. False imprisonment is a relatively inoffensive, harmless restraint of another person. It is usually a misdemeanor, punishable by no more than a year in jail. Parental kidnapping is the abduction of a child by a parent. The law on parental kidnapping varies from jurisdiction to jurisdiction: Some jurisdictions define it as a felony, others as a misdemeanor. Many states consider parental kidnapping to be less offensive than classic kidnapping because of the strong bond between parents and children. The chief judicial concern with the charge of kidnapping is double jeopardy, which is multiple punishment for the same offense. It is prohibited by the fifth amendment to the U. Kidnapping often is an act that facilitates another offense, such as rape, robbery, or assault. Rape, robbery, and assault often involve the act of moving a person against his or her will, which is the gravamen i. Thus, a persistent problem with kidnapping prosecutions is in determining whether a kidnapping conviction would constitute a second punishment for the same act. Legislatures have passed statutes, and courts have fashioned rules, to prevent and detect double jeopardy in kidnapping cases. Generally, these laws and rules hold that for kidnapping to be charged as a separate crime, some factor must set the asportation apart from a companion crime. Most courts will sustain multiple convictions if the asportation exposes the victim to increased risk of harm or results in harm to the victim separate from that caused by the companion offense. In other jurisdictions, the test is whether the asportation involves a change of environment or is designed to conceal a companion offense. In most states, an asportation of a few feet may constitute the separate offense of kidnapping; in other states, distance is not a factor. In New York State, for example, the focus of the kidnapping statute is not distance, but purpose. Thus, an asportation of 27 city blocks might not constitute kidnapping if it is merely incidental to a companion crime People v. Likewise, an asportation from the borough of Manhattan to the borough of Queens might not constitute kidnapping if it plays no significant role in the commission of another crime People v. Some states have eliminated the asportation element from their kidnapping statutes. In Ohio, for example, kidnapping is defined in part as restraining the liberty of another person Ohio Rev. This creates an increased risk of double jeopardy in kidnapping convictions because, by definition, every robbery, rape, or assault would constitute kidnapping. However, the Ohio state legislature has enacted a statute that prohibits multiple convictions for the same conduct unless the defendant exhibits a separate animus i. Whether the prosecution proves a separate animus to kidnap is a question of fact based on the circumstances surrounding the crime. Logan, 60 Ohio St. Under the facts of the case, the asportation had no significance apart from the rape offense. According to the court, the defendant had displayed no animus beyond that necessary to commit rape, so punishment for both rape and kidnapping was not warranted. In contrast, in State v. In Wagner, the defendant approached two women on two separate occasions in a laundromat. Both times, the defendant tried to force the women into a bathroom to rape them. He was convicted of two counts of attempted first-degree sexual assault, one count of kidnapping while armed, and one count of attempted kidnapping while armed. On appeal, he argued that he should not have been convicted of kidnapping because, under section The court disagreed, holding that forced movement from one room to another falls within the meaning of the kidnapping statute. The kidnapping of children has presented a particularly emotional issue for lawmakers. NCMEC serves as a resource in providing assistance to parents, children, law enforcement, schools, and the community in recovering missing children and raising public awareness about ways to help prevent child abduction. This information includes descriptions and pictures of the missing child, the suspected abductor, a suspected vehicle, and any other information available and valuable to identifying the child and suspect. From its beginnings in Texas, the AMBER Alert system spread until, by , 55 versions had been adopted at local, regional, and statewide levels. As a result, many people were convinced that the late s and new millennium saw a sharp decline in child kidnappings, which were well publicized, thanks to AMBER Alerts. In fact, the FBI reported that child abductions had actually declined from the s, from an average between and per year to only 93 in Under this bill, the attorney general, in cooperation with the secretary of transportation and the chairman of the federal communications commission FCC , appoints a National AMBER Alert Coordinator to
