Within a few generations, the Catholic Irish were reduced to abject poverty, were illiterate or nearly so and unskilled. By then, the Irish had become a nation of tenant farmers. One visitor from France noted that nowhere in Europe had he seen such poverty as he saw in Ireland. Eye witness accounts of the life of the average Irish tenant farmer confirm that his life was one of desperation and deprivation. Nearly half of the rural population lived in small windowless mud cabins. Furniture consisted of a bed and some chairs--and only a very few had such luxuries. It was normal for farm animals, pigs and chickens, to sleep in the cabin with the people. However, the good news was that the huts were always warm in the winter thanks to the readily available peat. Greedy landowners increased their rental income by dividing and sub-dividing their land again and again until most families were attempting to live on less than an acre of land and paying rents double that being charged in England for a much larger plot. Since potatoes were such an efficient crop, by the late eighteenth century it was practically the only crop grown by the tenant farmers. Many never in their lifetimes had ever tasted meat or bread. Their every meal consisted of potatoes, and sometimes buttermilk. As you might expect, the Irish did not take all this cruel and inhuman treatment placidly. The outcome of the Penal Laws was that evasion of the law became the duty of every Irish Catholic. These were gangs of men wearing white shirts over their clothes who rode the countryside at night tearing down fences, hamstringing cattle, and burning barns. When these people were caught, the group dispensed a people justice in a terrible form of revenge. They also rode up to manor houses destroying property and shooting through the windows. As a result, many landlords lived in permanently barricaded houses guarded by teams of sentries. By the end of nineteenth century the Irish had organized enough to develop a war strategy which would become the Insurrection of 1848. The plan was to have revolts break out simultaneously all over Ireland at the same time that a large force of French soldiers landed in Ireland. Unfortunately, the ships carrying the French army ran into a severe storm as they were in sight of land and most of the ships sank. Nevertheless, the Irish revolted on cue and in spite of the fact that they were armed with only pikes and clubs they did remarkably well against the Loyalist soldiers armed with muskets and canon. The crucial battle was fought at a place called Vinegar Hill in County Wexford. Here the Irish rebels made a determined stand that ended in disaster when the Loyalist troops opened fire with a battery of canon. One observer commented that the rebels "fell like new mown grass. The opening stanza goes like this. We are the Boys of Wexford, Who fought with heart and hand. To burst in twain the galling chain, And free our native land. In the mopping up operations there and in other parts of Ireland, thousands were butchered while on their knees begging for mercy. In those final days of war, more than 50,000 were killed

The victim[edit] Kinsella was born the son of cab driver George Kinsella and his wife Deborah, a school secretary. He has a half-brother, three half-sisters and a younger full sister. Friends spoke of his caring and comical nature, adding he was "full of energy" and that he was "the life and soul of his class". He had also written a creative writing piece in which he imagined his own death from stabbing. Braithwaite and his friends subsequently fled the scene. Shortly before 2am on 29 June, Kinsella and his friends decided to return home. When they noticed they were being followed his friends began to run. Kinsella however did not, it is thought because he knew he had nothing to do with the earlier disturbance. He then crossed over the road in order to distance himself. As the three closed in on him he was heard pleading, "What are you coming over to me for? It was reported Kinsella had lost thirty pints of blood, the average teenage body holding only seven. The crowd were heard chanting "What are we here for? Why are we here? He was given a one-year detention and training order in [22] but during his sentence was cut on appeal to community service. Witnesses, forensics and apprehension[edit] All three defendants were witnessed running together at Kinsella prior to the murder and later standing together shortly afterwards. Despite belief at one stage that knives used in the murder were found, the police never found the murder weapon or weapons involved. Later he claimed he had seen Alleyne stab Kinsella but he had not been involved himself. He stated that Alleyne had a reputation for using weapons and was concerned about the impact that telling the police would have upon his family. Letter from Alleyne to Kellie[edit] Aware that his cousin Kellie was going to give evidence against him, Alleyne wrote a threatening letter to her from jail, reading: To Slag aka snitch , You are a let down to the family. You are not my cousin, believe that. How are you gonna give my letters to boydem and be snitching on me? You are not real at all. When will I see you? People in the North no [sic] who I am. When the shit hits the fan, you snitch. Say no more, I am ghost. I got your statements, everyone will know that Kellie is a snitch. You see, snitches get touched. You see blood, Tottenham ride or die. Covert tape[edit] Police obtained a licence to record Braithwaite, Alleyne and Kika in the back of a police van, where they were able to establish that the three knew each other. On 13 October all three defendants pleaded not guilty to the charge of murder. Braithwaite claimed that Kinsella had thrown a punch at him, although there was no supporting evidence of this. After this, Braithwaite claimed he saw Alleyne carry out the murder. Alleyne claimed that he had been contacted by Braithwaite and asked to back him following the dispute at Shillibeers, although no phone records identified a call between Braithwaite and Alleyne prior to the attack. Kika exercised his right to silence and did not take the witness stand. This resulted in a new 25 year knife murder tariff through the Schedule 21 Review of the Criminal Justice Act which was relevant to the sentencing in this case. He continued saying that there was "no possible excuse" for such an "arrogant and unfeeling attack on someone who had done nothing". Brooke also travelled to New York to see prisons using short, sharp shock treatments to rehabilitate young offenders. The documentary also points out the success of Operation Blunt 2, which carried out over , stop and searches , leading to over 10, arrests and the confiscation of over 5, knives within the timeline of the documentary. On 5 October , the media released extracts of a letter written by Alleyne in prison to his fellow gang members. Within the letter, he boasted of being "the king of swagger", referring to his gang as the "stab gang". He also bragged about "taming" the prison where he is serving his life sentence. On 13 November Juress Kika lost his appeal to challenge his 19 year sentence. He argued his sentence was "manifestly excessive"; however, The Lord Judge , Mr Justice Penry-Davey and Mr Justice Henriques rejected this statement saying that the term could not "remotely" be described as excessive. They concluded that "there is no true mitigation. There was no guilty plea, no remorse, and no insight into the devastation that had been caused". They accepted that the applicant was young when the murder was committed but added that Kika "knew exactly what he was doing. They were all equally involved. They all intended to kill the young victim. They had hunted him down and mercilessly done him to death to revenge an insignificant slight for which he bore no responsibility whatsoever. But â€” we cannot mince words â€” he was cut down before he could reach safety.

Kinsella's revenge. [Mark Falcon] -- - and twin brothers Fin and Ray Kinsella become involved in what was to be called 'the Newton General Massacre'. It was destined to lead Ray on the road to revenge.

Now the teenage Anna rebels against the role that has been forced upon her though it could mean the death of her sister. Twenty nine year old Allie Nelson is set to marry a wealthy lawyer, but is haunted by thoughts of the one she loved long ago. Message in a Bottle - Theresa Osborne is divorced and cynical about love and life. This changes when she finds a bottle on the beach which contains a love letter. This is a beautiful story for those who choose to believe in the miracle of finding that special someone. Lock and Key - Ruby has been living alone in the farmhouse since her mother abandoned her, but when this is discovered she is sent to live with her sister Cora who she has not seen in about 10 years. A nice large house, private school, new clothes, and a promise for the future are quite an adjustment to make. Just Listen - Annabel Greene is the youngest of three very different sisters. She has had a very bad summer and must now return to school. She has never been so lonely or so sad, yet she must face each day. As she has her own problems to confront, her entire family is dealing with issues that plague her sister, Whitney. By circumstance, Annabel and Owen, whose life revolves around music, become friends. It is Owen who will help Annabel to meet certain challenges. It might have been a very long summer, but then by chance Macy meets an interesting group of people. I loved everyone in the Wish Catering crew, but most especially Wes. No matter the difficulties life has thrown each member of Wish they persevere because they must. Dreamland - Caitlin is the younger and she feels second-rate sister to Cass who is perfect in every way. Now Caitlin is 16 and rather than starting at Yale, Cass has run off with a guy. This year for Caitlin is about school, cheerleading, parties, her boyfriend, and so much much more. Unfortunately, this novel has an important message every young lady needs to hear. Keeping the Moon - Colie and her mother used to be fat. They moved frequently and were homeless for a time. Now mom has a good job and they live in a nice house. Unfortunately, because of a really mean girl at school, Colie has acquired a reputation she did not deserve. Mom is going to Europe to work for the summer and Colie is going to spend the summer with her eccentric aunt. That Summer - Summers hold special memories for many of us: Haven, younger sister to Ashley, is fondly remembering a summer five years ago because in this current summer her world is falling apart. Her father had an affair, her parents divorced, and now he is getting married to the co-worker with whom he had the affair. Someone Like You - Halley and Scarlet, both 16 and juniors in high school, have been best friends forever. Scarlet was always the strong one, but now she needs Halley to be there for her. As they begin the new school year, Scarlet is pregnant and her boyfriend has been killed in a motorcycle accident. Meanwhile Halley has problems of her own. Halley and her mother, a psychologist, have gotten along well in the past but that has changed. This Lullaby - Remy, Jess, Chloe, and Lissa are friends sort of and now it is the summer between high school and college. This is a time of transition for each of them, but the story concentrates on Remy who because her mother has had a series of husbands and Remy never even met her father, she is very cynical about love. The Sisterhood of the Traveling Pants - A wonderful story about Tibby, Carmen, Lena, and Bridget, four very different friends who are spending their first summer apart from one another. Each of the girls faces her own crisis and, in the end, they are there for each other. The Fourth Summer of the Sisterhood. Coronation Where R You? Something Blue 2nd - Shallow, vapid, Darcy Rhone has always believed that the beautiful people are blessed, but then her plain looking friend Rachel White steals her fiance leaving Darcy alone and pregnant by another man. This is a novel about forgiveness, friendship, true love, and the happy-ever-after so many seek. The Myth of Penelope and Odysseus.

Rock of Dunamase added 5 new photos. The site consists of a raised circular rampart breached at two sides allowing grazing cattle to wander through at will. It is now difficult to image that here in this peaceful place overlooking the beautiful countryside was once the Palace of an Irish King frequently mentioned in the ancient Annals and an act of genocide against 40 Lords of Laois and Offaly and their families on new years day in 1171. During his reign the Munster men invaded Leinster as far as Mullaghmast. The dispossessed clans appealed to the King of Ulster and with his help proceeded to drive out the Munster men from the area. The Cow Tribute or Borumha was an important element in the relationship between King and subjects and in our own locality we have Aughraboura the area where the Cow Tribute was once paid. In Mullaghmast was the site of a pitched battle between the Clans of Dowlings and Kinsellas resulting in a victory for the latter. The usual rivalry between the two great Munster tribes overlooked in the face of the coming enemy now resurfaced and the men of Desmond thought they would take advantage of the Thomand men who were weakened by exertion and carrying many wounded. Those nursing wounds used moss to stem the flow of blood and declared their intention of playing their part in the fight against the Desmonds. The latter on hearing this left the area whereupon the men of Thomand travelled onwards to Ath Ae where they drank the water from the River Barrow and cleaned their wounds. However it was in that occurred an event which was to fix the name of Mullaghmast in Irish memories for ever more. Tradition relates that leaders of the Seven Septs of Laois and their followers who had waged a constant war against English settlers were summoned to the Rath at Mullaghmast under terms which guaranteed their safety. The horse wounded in the escape collapsed and died near Brackna Woods giving to the area a name which it still bears - The Bleeding Horse. A carved stone commemorating the massacre of was placed in the centre of the Rath in by the Greise Valley Development Association. This is the only visible reminder of the horrible happenings of over years ago. The SequiCentenary of that event so well documented in Irish histories was celebrated in with the unveiling of a suitably inscribed stone on the roadside nearest to the Rath of Mullaghmast. On the same side of the Rath and next to the roadway is the famous long stone of Mullaghmast reputed to mark the grave of a Munster Chieftan. The seven foot high granite stone is the only one of its kind in the area and was evidently brought from afar to its present site. Mullaghmast once had another six small Rathes in the earlier mentioned Repeal meeting field but they have been razed leaving the larger Rath of Mullaghmast as the only visible reminder of the once great Palace of Mullaghmast. An account of the Mullaghmast massacre: The last five of these were, at that time, Roman Catholics, by whom the poor people murdered at Mullaghmast were chiefly invited there, in pretence that said people should enter into an alliance offensive and defensive with them.

Archives | ENDED A FEUD WITH VITRIOL; HENRY KINSELLA'S COWARDLY REVENGE ON MRS. CONWAY. Wife of a Rival Janitor with Whom He Has Been at War for Years -- Lay in Wait for Her, Dashed a Tin Pail.

Sophie Kinsella is one of my favourite authors. Her books are funny and pure escapism. Here are the reviews for her standalone books I will review the Shopaholic series separately. What an absolute treat this was to read. I took this on my holiday with me as I do like a good dose of chick-lit while relaxing in my sunlounger and Sophie Kinsella never lets me down. This book was a delight from start to finish. It is narrated by Lara, newly dumped and struggling to run a business on her own. All she needs is to be pestered by the ghost of her Great Auntie Sadie whom she never even met but is here, larger than life, as a 23 year old dancing, drinking, fun-loving girl that only Lara can see and whom she insists help her find her necklace before she is buried without it. The character of Sadie was just fabulous! One of the most endearing I have come across in a long time; she was such good fun. This book is my new favourite out of all the independents i. I love, love, loved it! In Remember Me Lexi wakes up in hospital thinking that it is still and she is going out with Loser Dave, has wonky teeth, loads of friends and works in a low paid job in a carpet company. The story follows Lexi as she tries to fit in with her new life and fill in the gaps as to how she ended up where she did and how she managed to alienate all her friends in the process. All the usual magic is here – young girl, a love interest or two, nice clothes and shoes v. While I agree that nothing can beat the Shopaholic series who could replace Becky? Thumbs up for Ms Kinsella once again. Can you Keep a Secret is such a funny book. A great idea for a story and a great heroine make this big-hearted book a real joy to read. This was the first of all Kinsellas books that I read and it was the start of a love affair with all her books. Samantha is a high flying, stressed out workaholic lawyer for a huge London firm and spends her every waking moment either working or thinking about work and that promotion to Partner she so desperately wants. To say that Samantha has no domestic skills whatsoever is an understatement but somehow she manages to muddle her way through mainly by ordering sandwiches through a catering company and sending the laundry away to be ironed. Of course, there is a sexy gardner to liven up the plot too which always helps. I really enjoyed this book, I just love Sophie Kinsella.

Chapter 6 : Foster by Claire Keegan: review - Telegraph

Katie realises that she can get her revenge but quickly discovers that from the outside, everyone's life looks perfect and that Demeter might be as unhappy as she is. What I didn't mention is Alex, the love interest and that's because he is a secondary character.

Share via Email Ben Kinsella. Yet his brutal reputation remains as large as ever, particularly on the "turf" which his gang - the infamous Clerkenwell Crime Syndicate, also known as the A Team - has controlled for decades. The territory in Islington includes the spot where Ben Kinsella, 16, was murdered 12 months ago while celebrating the end of his GCSE exams. Ben was the brother of a former EastEnders actress, Brooke Kinsella. His death is the most high-profile teenage stabbing in a long line of seemingly unfathomable murders. On Friday his three killers, like the year-old Adams, found their futures were behind bars as they were sentenced to life with a minimum of 19 years. Jade Braithwaite, 18, Michael Alleyne, 20, and Juress Kika, 19, were part of the new wave of "wannabe" criminals vying to emulate "old-school" crime lords such as Adams. For the Adams family, reportedly linked to 25 murders, it seemed an unusual move. There were no business interests at stake or any threat to their "criminal enterprises". One senior police source said: On the streets where Ben was stabbed 11 times in five seconds, the word of the Adams family still resonates, a throwback to another era that even the police seem to regret has passed. A retired detective who specialised in north London gang activity said the Adams modus operandi was extremely violent, but similar to that of the Krays in that only rival criminals would be targeted. Met commander Mark Simmonds, the head of Operation Blunt 2 which targets youth violence, said: This "chaotic" posturing on British streets is an increasing threat to young people, police warn. He quickly identified two factors that would be chillingly evident in his death. The first was the actual reason for violence. Ben, an innocent bystander, was killed after a spat in a bar that spiralled into a frenzied stabbing. The court heard how Braithwaite acted in revenge for a claim that he had earlier been "disrespected". Detective chief inspector John Macdonald, who led the murder inquiry, said: They feel that they have to respond". The second factor identified by Sutherland is the speed of retaliation. Very quickly you can have a group gathered outside the gates. Another issue is the belief among detectives that most knife carriers have never contemplated what happens when a blade is thrust into the body. One wound was nearly seven inches deep. I remember talking to one youth worker who told me that their aspirations were limited to crime, jail or death. He already had a place at college and was a keen actor. Three days before Braithwaite, Alleyne and Kika were handed life sentences, another London jury heard how a year-old army cadet, Shaquille Smith, was stabbed to death by a gang in an unprovoked attack two miles from where Ben was killed. But for detectives investigating such murders, familiar, deeper societal issues often emerge. Sutherland believes the breakdown of the family unit exerts a profoundly negative impact on young men. They are two of the most alarming and recurring features for me". There is no controlling influence. They were the bottom-feeders of the London drugs chain. In essence, they were loners, an insecure trio of youths with only the muscle to pick on younger targets. But as he got older and started dealing, this side of him was all but extinguished, replaced by a brutal desire to make money through drugs. It helped that they were physically powerful, making those who came into contact with them instantly wary. Police believe the three youths would have made nominal profits and knew they would have to impress dealers up the chain if they wanted to progress through the narcotics hierarchy. Then they want to get themselves noticed and that is when they become potentially dangerous to other people. Indeed, when they were sentenced they gloried in their moment of infamy, making gun gestures. As the trial had progressed they had eyeballed witnesses and feigned boredom in court. They could meet a girl, have a family, get a career One of them [Braithwaite] is 6ft 6in. Ben was 5ft 9in.

Chapter 7 : Khloe Kinsella's role play blog

The fun comes when Katie hatches a revenge plan on her former boss; a plan, like all plans made in the heat of the moment, fails miserably but does lead to an unexpected friendship and a new understanding that things aren't always what they seem.

One of the men he struck down was called Calatan, and he was a great sorcerer. He left behind a pregnant wife, who gave birth to sextuplets: Cuchulainn, knowing nothing of this, carried on with his life for many years, but when the time was ripe, the sons and daughters of Calatan set out to take their revenge on the man who had killed their father. Conchubar Mac Neasa, the King of Ulster, heard of their plan. He realized that if he lost Cuchulainn, his greatest warrior, Emain Macha would fall, and his reign could come to an end. So he decided to protect Cuchulainn for as long as he could. He called Cuchulainn to come and stay in Emain Macha. He distracted him with sports and feasts, and told him nothing of the threat that was coming, knowing that Cuchulainn would want to go out and face it head-on. But the three sons and three daughters of Calatan came to Emain Macha, and using their magic, they brewed up the sounds of war. The noise was terrible, steel clashing, battle cries, feet stamping, and the screams of the dying, but Conchubar was prepared. He invited all of his men for a great feast, and there was such singing and storytelling, drinking and revelry, that they drowned out the noises of the magical war outside. It was called this because no sound from outside could enter the valley, so no matter what magical noises the children of Calatan brewed up, Cuchulainn would not hear them there. When their magical noises failed to draw Cuchulainn out, the three sons and three daughters of Calatan realized that they had to do something else. She told him he was needed in battle, to pick up his arms and enter the fray. Cuchulainn leapt at the challenge. He picked up his weapons and went to hitch his horse, Lia Macha, the Grey of Macha, to his chariot. But for the first time since he had tamed her, Lia Macha showed him the whites of her eyes and danced away. He tried a second time, and again she shied away, and then on his third attempt, he berated her: He called to his charioteer, Laeg, who stepped up into the chariot beside him and took the reins. His mother Deichtre came up to him with a farewell cup, full of wine to give him her blessing in the coming fight, but as he lifted the cup to his lips, the wine turned into blood. He threw it away, and Deichtre refilled the cup with wine, but again it turned to blood. Determined that her son would not go into battle without her blessing to protect him, Deichtre filled the cup again, and offered it again, but the wine turned into blood a third time, and Cuchulainn could not drink from it. As he crossed over a ford, Cuchulainn saw an old woman washing clothes in the river. He came to a group of three hags by the side of the road. They were roasting a hound on a rowan stick. He stopped to give them his greeting, and they invited him to join their meal. Cuchulainn was under a geasa never to taste the meat of a hound, his namesake, so he tried to decline as politely as he could. But the hags jeered him, saying that he was too used to fine eating, having been with the king, and he thought himself too proud to sit and share their mean feast with them. His honour as a warrior would not allow him to turn down their hospitality, or put himself above anyone, or say he thought he was above anyone, no matter how poor or lowly, so he sat down and took a piece of the hound meat with his left hand, and ate it. And when it touched his lips, all the strength ebbed out of his left arm, and the meat dropped onto his thigh. As soon as the meat touched it, all the strength flowed out of his left leg, so that his whole left side was now no stronger than that of a normal man. He got up, knowing that he had broken his geasa and lost half his strength. These women were the Morrigan, the goddess of war. Long before that, she had offered Cuchulainn her love, and he had turned her down. This was his punishment for rejecting the goddess. On he went, in his chariot with Laeg, until he encountered the three sons of Calatan, standing in the road, barring his way. The son of Cu Roi, called Lugaid, was with them. It had been prophesized that the first three spears Cuchulainn cast in this battle would kill three kings, and his enemies wanted to get the spears, so that they would benefit from the prediction. The first son of Calatan asked him for a spear, and threatened to satirize Cuchulainn if he did not hand it over. Lugaid Cu Roi pulled out the spear, and threw it back at Cuchulainn, missing him, but striking Laeg, his charioteer and constant companion, through the stomach. So fell Laeg Mac Rianganabara, king among charioteers. The second son of Calatan stepped forward, and asked for a spear. Cuchulainn refused, saying he had given enough to satisfy his honour, but the son of Calatan threatened to satirize all of Ulster. Cuchulainn fell to his knees, and wept over her. So fell Lia Macha, king among horses. Lugaid Cu Roi pulled the spear out, and threw it at Cuchulainn, straight through his stomach, spraying out his intestines. Cuchulainn, mortally wounded, had only enough strength in him to crawl to a nearby lake for a drink of water. His enemies hung back, afraid that he had more strength than he was showing. The water revived him somewhat. He could not bear the thought of dying on the ground like an animal, but wanted to die on his feet, like a warrior. He crawled to a standing-stone, and tied himself to it, gripping his sword tightly. As he stood there, dying, a raven came and tripped over his intestine. Cuchulainn laughed, and died with the laugh in his mouth. For three days after he died, he stood tied to the rock, and none of his enemies were brave enough to approach, and make sure he was dead. At the end of three days, the Morrigan took the shape of a raven, and perched on his shoulder, and when he did not move, they knew it was safe. So fell Cuchulainn, king among warriors.

Toward the end of , I received a very exciting e-mail from Twitter, that Sophie Kinsella was following me! It totally made my entire day and week!

It has the most unique story of all her books. She has no clue about her present life and how much has changed all these years. I re-read it a few days back and it is a very lovely book. It makes me feel how much deceiving life can truly be and how much we tend to keep to ourselves. It makes me think if anyone in our lives knows us completely and I think that there absolutely should be one person in our life who should know each and everything about us, who should know us inside out and who should be our constant in a world so full of variables. Again a very compelling read. Can you keep a secret? This book has a very interesting beginning which makes the base for the rest of the book. A girl blurts out all her secrets to a stranger on a scary flight and her world goes topsy turvy when that man reappears in her life in the most frightening role. After some meeting, she goes on to trusting this man, subsequently falling in love, but her happiness is short lived as all her secrets are telecasted on national TV and she is left shame faced in front of every person she has ever known. This book has many hilarious portions and a few makes you weak in your knees romantic ones, and in all it is a very good read if you are in a mood for something light. Have you ever been in a relationship where you feel a bit out of their league, like they can date someone so much smarter than you are, then this is the book for you. The matters get worse when she loses her million pounds ring and her mobile phone at a hotel and is left stranded unable to tell him about the blunder she has made. Half her problems are solved when she finds a nice working phone in hotel dustbin which she thinks she can use as everything in the bin is up for grabs to anyone in the world. But this phone is a very special phone, who definitely has the central part in the book. What happens when they are connected by this phone is history. This is love story for the digital era and recommends that every couple should share a phone once in their life. It is a very special book with the most amazing ending. Recently, at my job I made a mistake which made me so mad at myself that I had a nervous breakdown. Think what will happen when right when you are being made a partner at your big-ass firm, you uncover a mistake which will cost your client millions of dollars. Our girl immediately has a nervous breakdown and she walks into oblivion not knowing where she is going and what she is saying, only to wake up the next day and find herself hired as a domestic help. What will she do, especially when she finds out that not only was she fired, she is now a national joke, will she go back or will she do a job she knows nothing about and where she makes as much money in a week as she used to charge per hour from her clients. To make matters better, comes in our hero who transforms her from a timid thing to an independent happy glowing girl who can make a double tiered cake from scratch. This book does not say that women are best at home, instead it makes me think about work life balance. It makes me wonder if our jobs get so important that our lives suffer. When I made that mistake, it was because I was over worked, and after that I keep reminding myself that work is important but it should empower you and not control your life. I personally think that everyone no matter girl or boy should know how to do their chores and should take time for their loved ones. So, this one is the most unusually beautiful and the most funny ghost story you would have ever read. Was the ghost even real you might wonder. But to me she definitely was. She is the cutest, liveliest ghost, or should I say guardian angel, one our protagonist really needed to get on with her life, which she herself has made stagnant, waiting for a person who never had and never will love her. I almost forgot to include this one, and that would have been a terrible mistake as this book is an absolute delight. It takes on two generations of lovers and gives you a taste of history in the most beautiful manner. I beg you to read this one. It has love, friendship, deceit, revenge, mistake, redemption and laughter rolled into one story. But in reality its really hard to have such an awesome friend or to keep them if you had them in past and impossible even inadvisable to find an absolutely sorted life partner. If the girl in your book is struggling with her career, how the guy is so annoyingly well settled. In fact, if you have problems, your life partner is allowed to have them too. You both can sort your lives together and I truly feel when life partners go through stuff together, it makes them stronger and closer to each other. Do read them and let me know how you like them. As you can see I have read them all on my kindle I have basic kindle model. If you want to buy one do read my blog on Kindles here.

Chapter 9 : KINSELLA'S ADDICKTED - Mirror Online

The senseless murder of year-old Ben Kinsella provoked a vengeful reaction from the Adams family, the underworld gang that once ruled north London.
