Many of the artists associated with land art had been involved with minimal art and conceptual art. His influence on contemporary land art, landscape architecture and environmental sculpture is evident in many works today. According to critic Barbara Rose , writing in Artforum in , he had become disillusioned with the commodification and insularity of gallery bound art. One example of land art in the 20th century was a group exhibition created in at the Dwan Gallery in New York. The exhibition was directed by Thomas W. Gordon Matta-Clark, who lived in Ithaca at the time, was invited by Sharp to help the artists in "Earth Art" with the on-site execution of their works for the exhibition. Perhaps the best known artist who worked in this genre was the American Robert Smithson whose essay "The Sedimentation of the Mind: Earth Projects" provided a critical framework for the movement as a reaction to the disengagement of Modernism from social issues as represented by the critic Clement Greenberg. How much of the work, if any, is visible is dependent on the fluctuating water levels. Since its creation, the work has been completely covered, and then uncovered again, by water. A steward of the artwork in conjunction with the Dia Foundation, [13] the Utah Museum of Fine Arts regularly curates programming around the Spiral Jetty, including a "Family Backpacks" program. It consists of a pile of gravel by the side of a partially mirrored gallery wall. In its simplicity of form and concentration on the materials themselves, this and other pieces of land art have an affinity with minimalism. There is also a relationship to Arte Povera in the use of materials traditionally considered "unartistic" or "worthless". Turrell began work in on possibly the largest piece of land art thus far, reshaping the earth surrounding the extinct Roden Crater volcano in Arizona. Some projects by the artists Christo and Jeanne-Claude who are famous for wrapping monuments, buildings and landscapes in fabric have also been considered land art by some, though the artists themselves consider this incorrect. Eduardo Sanguinetti, the Latino-American philosopher and land-artist, presented in his "Sculptures in Earth". They were placed in natural spaces, they became functional as plants and animals made their homes in that particular topos installed in the La Pampa desert. Later, they acquired the noise of codes capable of classifying smells and colours, and will complete the original idea of our artist, who was at that time absorbed by the countryside and its specular radiation In nature, there is a type of spontaneous activity. This concept does not exist in cultured man, and if it does remain in children, it is like a faint reminiscence of the primitive mind Consequently I think that the survival of an awareness of the supernatural in nature, should, in all works of Land-Art, be the thing which "animates Everything". With the sudden economic down turn of the mids funds from these sources largely stopped. With the death of Robert Smithson in a plane crash in the movement lost one of its most important figureheads and faded out. Charles Ross continues to work on the Star Axis project, which he began in In most respects, "land art" has become part of mainstream public art and in many cases the term "land art" is misused to label any kind of art in nature even though conceptually not related to the avant-garde works by the pioneers of land art. The Earth art of the s were sometimes reminiscent the much older land works, Stonehenge , the Pyramids , Native American mounds , the Nazca Lines in Peru , Carnac stones and Native American burial grounds , and often evoked the spirituality of such archeological sites.
