If you want to operate at the level of 'WOW!', be an exceptional leader and live life 'full out' - buy this book. Darren Hardy, Publisher, SUCCESS magazine Read this book and make the leap to extraordinary performance, innovation and influence at work and in life. Keith Ferrazzi, New York.

And leaders can lead, whether they have an official title or not. Here are some ways you can show leadership without having a title. You can rethink accountability. You can study coaching and develop your own coaching model. You can ask your manager to walk you through theirs. You can do some role play scenarios. And you should certainly pay tons of attention during your own coaching sessions. You can show leadership by developing others. Whether you do this formally by becoming a subject matter expert that your organization utilizes as part of their formal organizational development programs, or informally by coming alongside your teammates and teaching and training them on things, you can and should be consistently looking for opportunities to invest in the growth of others. You can show leadership by building community. Instead of doing what most people do, which is focusing on making themselves shine, do something that seems a bit counterintuitive: Any way you slice it, leadership is service. This one may seem curiously obvious, but it really does separate leaders from talkers. Lots of folks talk about leading. Or talk about doing stuff. Leaders are actually get stuff done. This is especially powerful if it involves working together with your teammates to accomplish something together. You could do this in any number of ways. It could be a process improvement. Whatever it is, one of the things leaders do is make it easier for their teams to make things happen. Then serve them by clearing obstacles out of the way so they can do their thing. Be generous with your knowledge, time, energy, and expertise. Make your leadership a vehicle for service, not a vehicle for a promotion. Believe me, everyone will know the difference. Leaders ask questions to help people think, find out how they can serve, learn more about things, learn more about people, and so on. How can I help with this? What can I do to help our team get better? Can you help me get better at it? Can you help me understand why we do this? You can show leadership by taking responsibility. This will set you apart. While many within the workplace will do almost anything to blame anyone and everyone for things, be the one who takes responsibility. Step up and take ownership of problems. Every single person within an organization has influence. Some use it for good. Some people on teams breathe life and energy into their teammates. Others are an incessant source of negativity, drama, and gossip. Leaders, whether they have a title or not, rally the team around positivity and invest in pushing them forward. Regardless of what your job description says.

Chapter 2 : Book Review: The Leader Who had no Title | Lead on Purpose

Robin Sharma is one of the world's most highly respected leadership experts. He is devoted to the mission of helping organizations develop people who Lead Without a Title so that they win in this period of intense change.

The situations are unnaturally stilted and the dialogue scripted and redundant, like one is watching a skit being performed at a sales retreat. None of the characters are given enough background to forge any real connection with the reader. One problem I saw with the advice portion of the book was that no dissenting viewpoints are ever presented. Setbacks, conflicts, obligations and all the other things that real people have to deal with are hand-waved away. The result is that when the reader does bring up an objection, there is nothing in response. But I would also recommend highlighting the passages of advice, skimming the story, and giving everything a critical evaluation. Similar idea to learning about investing from the original Wealthy Barber. Things I want to remember: Can you prepare the same for me today too? There are some leftovers from the same dish. While revolting is a strong word to use against a book which contains appreciable wisdom, There is a common joke shared in the place where I come from. While revolting is a strong word to use against a book which contains appreciable wisdom, the verbose style of the book leaves a lot to be desired when it comes to inspiring the reader. If you have already read Robin Sharma, you can safely skip reading this book, for this book carries nothing new and everything that Robin Sharma has repeated in all his previous works. Having read almost a dozen books of Robin Sharma already, I picked up this book hoping to learn something new. But this book is nothing but old wine in new bottle, with a new label. Not just the style. The words and ideas also repeat themselves to a monotonous extent. Add to that a sprinkling of quotes from the great people in history. Also, this book could have been trimmed down to a total of hundred pages, in the styles of a Brian Tracy or Spencer Johnson. In fact, I feel that all the ideas that Robin Sharma has ever shared in his books could all be summarized into a page or two. Such a boring sermon!

Chapter 3 : The Leader Who Had No Title Quotes by Robin S. Sharma

The Leader Who Had No Title I always believed being Nice to someone is the best way to live life and achieve all those things you ever dreamt about. And this book only strengthens my belief further.

Share on Facebook A leader and a manager are not always one in the same. You can be a manager without being an effective leader. In the same way, you can lead and influence people without having a formal title that designates you as a manager or supervisor. Often, showcasing your leadership abilities without a title gets you noticed by a company when it has an open management or supervisory position. At level two, a leader is able to get others to follow his lead and take action because they want to, not because they have to. Thus, a manager may be stuck at level one, while a non-management employee may have level two or higher influence without the title. Empathy Empathy is a core trait of an effective leader. This is the ability to show awareness of and compassion for the situation or needs of another. While strong managers often have empathy, you can use empathy to lead without a title. In a work group, for instance, employees are often drawn to a coworker who proves to be an effective listener and an empathic confidant. When coworkers feel that you care about them and understand their plights, they are more apt to follow your example or give credence to your opinions or perspectives. Charisma Charisma is a unique personal quality that some people possess. It is a natural allure or attraction that draws people toward you. Confidence, a positive attitude and an intriguing personality contribute to your charismatic ability. When you attract attention from others, you are in a position to lead. Charismatic people often provoke enthusiasm and energy in a group. The expression "she lights up a room when she enters" typically describes a charismatic person. Examples Teamwork in companies has created numerous opportunities for informal leadership. While work teams often have managers, they also commonly complete tasks and projects without formal oversight. Within work teams, some people lead in task direction by sharing technical expertise and assuming responsibility. Others use social influence to build cooperation and to resolve conflicts. In other cases, you can serve as a leader by mentoring less-experienced coworkers or helping train them.
