When I first started learning about licensing, this licensing program was called Open Volume. And over the last seven years, I have sold it exactly zero times. One of the reasons for this is that you have to buy a lot of licenses all at once. Well, that dependsâ€¦ This is one of those licensing programs that will make you want to pull your hair out. For each product you add to your order, you get to dump a bucket of points into one of the pools. So if you buy an upgrade license of Windows 8. If you buy a license of Windows Server Standard, then you get to dump 15 points into the Server Pool. Each license of Office Standard is worth two points, so if you buy five licenses of Office Standard then you get to dump 10 points into the Application Pool. But if you reach points in one pool but not the others, then you will get a discount for the stuff in the full pool but not the stuff in the other pools. So in our example above, you would get a Level C discount for all your Server Licenses but not for your System or Application Licenses. The number of points a product is worth depends on what the product is and whether or not your purchase includes the license, Software Assurance, or both. I warned you it was complicated! So after you go through all of that trouble, how much will you actually save? For example, here is what you would save on Office Pro Plus licenses: Not terribly impressive if you ask me, but at least Microsoft throws you bone for buying so much from them at one time. It is much simpler than the Open Level C program discussed above. You just have to have or more desktops in your organization and standardize company-wide on Windows, Office, or a Core CAL suite. Once you do that, everything you place on that order will receive the Level C discount. But if you get all the desktops in your company standardized on Office Pro Plus, then the Level C discount kicks in when you buy at least licenses: This topic is not for the faint at heart, so pat yourself on the back. As always, Mirazon is here to help guide you through the maze of Microsoft licensing. The good news is that these Level C programs are rarely used at least in my experience. Tune in next time as we walk through these agreements which are designed for the large businesses of the world. Have questions about Microsoft licensing? Want to hear more from Mirazon?
