Lighting Light the night: By - October 16, Technical and stylistic tricks will help you develop an effective strategy for lighting your night scenes Hollywood, with its seemingly endless resources, spends loads of money on lighting nighttime scenes. But how do we “without a grip truck full of HMIs” try to approach lighting a subject or set at night? There are a few tricks of the trade that our budgets should allow. How do we accomplish this? Now, how do you replicate this light so that your audience is able to see what they need to, while keeping them in the reality you are trying to create? How do you show the emotion, reaction or movement of your character while either using this actual light or replicating it? Let me take you back to roughly and a painting by Mattias Stom figure 1. Notice how hard the light is on the faces and bodies. Look at the fall-off from this candle light. Any part of the subject that is closer to the light “the face, the robe, the hat feathers, etc. Although technically not a night shoot, the hard orange sun coming into a pitch black room is similar to the look you might aim for while lighting a night scene. Gard orange sun coming into a pitch black room is similar to the look you might aim for while lighting a night scene. Color Filmmaking convention says night scenes are blue in tint. Candle, torchlight and campfires are orange. Street lights are orange as well, fluorescent lighting comes off as green and neon can be just about any color. Those are the rules. The light at night seems to have been represented as blue for as long as color film has been a thing? Run some tests to see what looks best for your specific situation. Tricks of the Trade A favorite amongst noir directors is the silhouette. A similar noir shot to the silhouette is the high contrast shot. It still scares me. A favorite lighting trick amongst noir directors is the silhouette. In addition to high contrast lighting, strategic light placement can help add definition to your shots. You might remember the hair light or rim light from your three-point lighting class? Rim lights are yet another favorite for lighters of the night. And finally, an old trick: A wet street at night combined with light creates a more contrasty look with the dark blacks and the highlights. Another old Lighting Trick trick: Light the Night These technical and stylistic tricks will help you develop an effective strategy for lighting your night scenes. What have I missed? Let me know in the comments below.

Chapter 2 : Light The Night Boat Lights

"Lighting a night scene is easy: eliminate all light and it's a night scene." But then you have a black screen. The main objective in shooting a nighttime scene is too keep the shot looking like it's occurring at night, but letting your audience see what they need to see to move the story forward.
