

Chapter 1 : 11 Teacher-Tested Ways to Make Your Classroom Parents Adore You

Find out more about the ways that the award-winning parent-teacher communication app Bloomz can help you connect with parents. Whether you just need to keep in touch or you need to organize classroom events, Bloomz can make it quicker and easier.

But co-parenting amicably with your ex can give your children the stability, security, and close relationships with both parents they need. With these tips, you can remain calm, stay consistent, and resolve conflicts to make joint custody work and enable your kids to thrive. Research suggests that the quality of the relationship between co-parents can also have a strong influence on the mental and emotional well-being of children, and the incidence of anxiety and depression. Of course, putting aside relationship issues, especially after an acrimonious split, to co-parent agreeably can be easier said than done. Joint custody arrangements can be exhausting, infuriating, and fraught with stress. It can be extremely difficult to get past the painful history you may have with your ex and overcome built-up resentments. Despite the many challenges, though, it is possible to develop an amicable working relationship with your ex for the sake of your children. Making co-parenting work

The key to successful co-parenting is to separate the personal relationship with your ex from the co-parenting relationship. It may be helpful to start thinking of your relationship with your ex as a completely new one—one that is entirely about the well-being of your children, and not about either of you. Your marriage may be over, but your family is not; doing what is best for your kids is your most important priority.

Benefits for your children Through your co-parenting partnership, your kids should recognize that they are more important than the conflict that ended your marriage—and understand that your love for them will prevail despite changing circumstances. Kids whose divorced parents have a cooperative relationship: When confident of the love of both parents, kids adjust more quickly and easily to divorce and new living situations, and have better self-esteem. Better understand problem solving. Children who see their parents continuing to work together are more likely to learn how to effectively and peacefully solve problems themselves. Have a healthy example to follow. By cooperating with the other parent, you are establishing a life pattern your children can carry into the future to build and maintain stronger relationships. Are mentally and emotionally healthier. Children exposed to conflict between co-parents are more likely to develop issues such as depression, anxiety, or ADHD. Set hurt and anger aside Successful co-parenting means that your own emotions—any anger, resentment, or hurt—must take a back seat to the needs of your children. Get your feelings out somewhere else. Never vent to your child. Friends, therapists, or even a loving pet can all make good listeners when you need to get negative feelings off your chest. Exercise can also be a healthy outlet for letting off steam. If you feel angry or resentful, try to remember why you need to act with purpose and grace: If your anger feels overwhelming, looking at a photograph of your child may help you calm down. Resolve to keep your issues with your ex away from your children. Never use kids as messengers. When you use your children to convey messages to your co-parent, it puts them in the center of your conflict. The goal is to keep your child out of your relationship issues, so call or email your ex directly. Keep your issues to yourself. Never say negative things about your ex to your children, or make them feel like they have to choose. Your child has a right to a relationship with their other parent that is free of your influence. Improve communication with your co-parent Peaceful, consistent, and purposeful communication with your ex is essential to the success of co-parenting—even though it may seem absolutely impossible. It all begins with your mindset. Think about communication with your ex as having the highest purpose: Before contact with your ex, ask yourself how your talk will affect your child, and resolve to conduct yourself with dignity. Make your child the focal point of every discussion you have with your ex-partner. The goal is to establish conflict-free communication, so see which type of contact works best for you. Co-parenting communication methods However you choose to communicate, the following methods can help you initiate and maintain effective communication: Set a business-like tone. Speak or write to your ex as you would a colleague—with cordiality, respect, and neutrality. Relax and talk slowly. Instead of making statements, which can be misinterpreted as demands, try framing as much as you can as requests. Requests can begin "Would you be willing to listen? Communicating with maturity starts with listening. You can train yourself to not overreact to your ex, and over time you can become numb to the buttons they try to push. Though it may be extremely difficult in the early stages, frequent communication with your ex will convey the message to your children that you and your co-parent are a united front. Quickly relieve stress in the moment. But by practicing quick stress relief techniques, you can learn to stay in control when the pressure builds. This simple technique can jump-start positive communications between you. Apologizing can be very powerful in moving your relationship away from being adversaries. If a special outing with your ex is going to cut into your time with your child by an hour, graciously let it be. Plus, when you show flexibility, your ex is more likely to be flexible with you. Cooperating and communicating without blow-ups or bickering makes decision-making far easier on everybody. If you shoot for consistency, geniality, and teamwork with your co-parent, the details of child-rearing decisions tend to fall into place. Important lifestyle rules like homework issues, curfews, and off-limit activities should be followed in both households. The same can be done for rewarding good behavior. Making important decisions as co-parents Major decisions need to be made by both you and your ex. Whether you decide to designate one parent to communicate primarily with health care professionals or attend medical appointments together, keep one another in the loop. Speak with your ex ahead of time about class schedules, extra-curricular activities, and parent-teacher conferences, and be polite to each other at school or sports events. The cost of maintaining two separate households can strain your attempts to be effective co-parents. Set a realistic budget and keep accurate records for shared expenses. Be gracious if your ex provides opportunities for your children that you cannot provide. Resolving co-parenting disagreements As you co-parent, you and your ex are bound to disagree over certain issues. Keep the following in mind as you try to reach a consensus. Respect can go a long way. Simple manners should be the foundation for co-parenting. Being considerate and respectful includes letting your ex know about school events, being flexible about your schedule when possible, and taking their opinion seriously. If you disagree about something important, you will need to continue communicating. Never discuss your differences of opinions with or in front of your child. If you disagree about important issues like a medical surgery or choice of school for your child, by all means keep the discussion going. But if you want your child in bed by 7: Make transitions and visitation easier The actual move from one household to another, whether it happens every few days or just certain weekends, can be a very hard time for children. Help children anticipate change. Encourage packing familiar reminders like a special stuffed toy or photograph. Always drop off—never pick up the child. To help your child adjust: When children first enter your home, try to have some down time together—read a book or do some other quiet activity. Allow your child space. Children often need a little time to adjust to the transition. If they seem to need some space, do something else nearby. In time, things will get back to normal. Establish a special routine. Play a game or serve the same special meal each time your child returns. Kids thrive on routine—if they know exactly what to expect when they return to you it can help the transition. The problem may be one that is easy to resolve, like paying more attention to your child, making a change in discipline style, or having more toys or other entertainment. Or it may be that an emotional reason is at hand, such as conflict or misunderstanding. Talk to your child about their refusal. Go with the flow. Whether you have detected the reason for the refusal or not, try to give your child the space and time that they obviously need. It may have nothing to do with you at all. Talk to your ex. A heart-to-heart with your ex about the refusal may be challenging and emotional, but can help you figure out what the problem is. Try to be sensitive and understanding to your ex as you discuss this touchy subject. Recommended reading Co-Parenting After Divorce — A four-page booklet that includes a checklist of what to include in a co-parenting plan and descriptions of different types of custody arrangements.

Chapter 2 : Make Way for Tomorrow - Wikipedia

Being a parent to a young child often means finding a job that allows you to work from calendrierdelascience.comately, companies are increasingly accomodating a cultural shift toward telecommuting jobs and work.

Purpose of this guide This guide was created to educate parents on the options available to them to help their children to purchase a home. After evaluating this guide, readers will have a better understanding of: Loaning your child money for a home purchase. The plusses and minuses of loaning money to a child for a home purchase. Strategies for gifting money to children for a home purchase. How to work with maximum gift amounts so as not to incur gift taxes. Shared Equity Financing Agreements. The dangers of cosigning on a loan for your child. Strategies for purchasing property outright for a child Helping to guide your child through the process of buying a home and personal finance. How to safeguard yourself when helping a child to purchase a home. Introduction There are many good reasons for a parent to help a child to purchase a home. In tough economic times like these, assistance can actually help a child to break free from the rental cycle and start building some equity, and kick-starting an adult life that they might not be able to achieve otherwise. And at a time when interest rates are at a historically low level and the housing market is full of deals, it makes sense to help a child take advantage of the situation that may not come around again for some time. Purchase a home outright to give to a child. Enter into a shared equity agreement with the child. Give the child financial advice and guidance to get a loan on their own. There is no "right" way to assist your child to purchase a home. However, there are smarter ways to do it. With the proper legal guidance and financial advice, you can take advantage of tax laws and work with property law to make sure that you and your investment is protected. Throughout this guide, we will discuss the different strategies that a parent can take when helping a child to purchase a home. Overall, each approach allows the opportunity for benefits to both the parent and child as long as each party goes in with clearly defined expectations. Ultimately, the real benefit is an emotional one: Talk to a Lawyer This guide will give parents a better understanding of the issues involved in purchasing a home for a child. It will also help readers to ask the right questions when speaking to a legal professional. This guide is NOT a substitute for specific, tailored advice from a licensed attorney or financial planner. He cavalierly asks his parents for enough money for a down payment. They want to help Steven out, but fear that he is not mature enough to really take the loan seriously. Leslie is at the point in her life where she is ready to purchase a house and she has located the perfect one. Her parents offer to just give her the money to make up the difference, but she is afraid that they will ultimately use the gift as emotional leverage. She agrees to let her parents loan her the difference, but only if they draft up an agreement that clearly states the expectations of the loan and establishes a repayment schedule. Shari and Jeff are getting married in December and would like to purchase a home. However, they want to do it strategically so as not to increase their eventual exposure to estate taxes. Jenn and Scott have enough to purchase a very small home. They are excited, but it is just not big enough to start a family. Jenn and Scott end up getting a much larger house with a rental unit. The parents can deduct their expenses as well as the mortgage interest, the property taxes, insurance, maintenance, and utilities on income tax returns. Also, they can get their money back when Jenn and Scott sell the house and hopefully make a profit on the investment. Jonas would like to buy a condo, but cannot qualify for a large enough loan on his own due to some financial difficulties in his past. His parents would like to help but do not have the money on hand to do it. His parents are sympathetic and can see that he is on the up and up and finally in charge of his finances. Justine is in medical school and plans to ultimately practice medicine in the same city. She would love to own a home and get her life started, but cannot afford to while she is in school. Her parents are paying her rent and feel like it is money wasted. Kevin is in his mid twenties and is set on purchasing a home. He has explored some of his options and thinks that the best route for him is to get an adjustable rate mortgage on a house and then flip it before the rate goes up and use his profits to buy the house that he really wants. They sit down and explore his options and introduce him to a real estate professional who objectively analyzes his plan. The real estate professional explains that it is not likely that he will be able to flip a house in a bad neighborhood before the higher rates kick in. Instead, Kevin ends up buying a tiny starter house in a good neighborhood and plans to make renovations that will increase the value. Loaning Money To Your Children For A Purchase Loaning money for a down payment on a home is probably the first thing that comes to mind when you are thinking about helping a child out with a home. The biggest problem that parents face is actually getting their kids to pay back the loans and the resulting resentment that accumulates due to non-repayment of loans. If you actually expect to get paid back, or to at least formalize the act of the loan, or to just protect your relationship with your child, you will need to create a legal document that sets up the terms of the loan and a payment schedule. By doing this, you not only ensure that you get paid back, but you can set up a steady stream of income with a percentage rate that is lower than what a bank would charge but higher than what you might get on an investment. The satisfaction of getting your child into a home. A good strategy if you need your investment returned for retirement. In loaning the money, the interest could be more than a parent would get on an investment but less than the child would be paying on a mortgage. Of course, this is something that should be discussed with a tax official. It goes without saying, you should draw up a legal document with a lawyer and have everything spelled out. This not only solidifies the agreement between parent and child, but it also makes things legally clear and prevents future arguments if you have other children or you pass away and need to figure out your estate. You also want to create a legal document spelling out that the amount is a loan in order to prevent estate squabbles down the line. A parent should always charge interest on a loan even if they intend to eventually forgive the loan. People have many reasons for loaning a child money over gifting it to them. For some, it is to give the child a sense of responsibility for themselves and their finances. If this is the case and you are satisfied that your child has been responsible, you can forgive the rest of the loan and gift it to the child. Alternately, a loan may have strained the relationship to the point where the parent would just rather walk away from it. After unsuccessful attempts to change the payment schedule or spreading out the payments or lowering them, you could also just call it a gift and walk away. Of course, if your child cannot or will not repay the loan, you could write off the loss on your taxes as bad debt and take your child to court and possibly foreclose on the loan. If you really want to go that way! A situation like this just highlights the dangers of loaning money to a child who might be acting like, well, a child. Friends and family should be friends and family. Banks should lend money. This will keep your child to get a better rate on their loan and to avoid paying private mortgage insurance or PMI. Though it would seem that just giving the money away should be easy, large gifts can create problems of their own for high-net-worth individuals. So money given to your children as down payment or mortgage assistance could reduce what you could put into a trust or they could inherit tax-free. Gift taxes are typically the responsibility of the giver. The gift tax exemptions increase with inflation over time. The above figures are accurate for One benefit of giving the money is that it allows the parents to give away some of their estate while they are living. This can reduce estate taxes by reducing the amount of the estate that is passed on when they eventually pass away. Gifting rather than loaning the money allows parents to avoid possible strain on their relationship with their children. Giving a large gift of money might give some kids a sense of entitlement. Gifting makes things complicated when the lender has rules on the amount of a down payment that can be a gift. One of the most important reasons is to prevent future sibling arguments, especially in the case of your death. As always, there are upsides and downsides to each strategy. Cosigning Cosigning a lease is when a parent helps their child to get a lease that they would not otherwise qualify for. Most experts strongly suggest that parents avoid this situation. Investing in a home is a good strategy for a parent who needs to be paid back and possibly make some money on the house in the long run. It is also a good strategy if the parent wants to invest an amount that exceeds the annual gift tax. In this type of deal, the parent and child jointly purchase a home. Child and parent take their proportional share of property tax, maintenance, repair, and mortgage interest deductions. In these situations, the title can be held in numerous different ways. Benefit for the child: A larger home for less money, A smaller down payment. Can more easily qualify for a loan. Benefit for a parent: Rental income from a hopefully reliable tenant. A bigger investment portfolio and a bigger return than might be available on some conservative investments. Lenders will classify this as a residential loan that has a lower interest rate rather than as a rental property even though the parent is collecting rent. The parent is entitled to both the tax benefits of owning rental property as well as a share of the profits if the property is sold. However, the parent is entitled to deduct his or her share of expenses including the mortgage interest, the property taxes, insurance, maintenance, and utilities on income tax returns.

Chapter 3 : Watch Dogs Game Review

10 Ways Stay-at-Home Moms and Dads Can Make Extra Money By Cameron Huddleston, Online Editor Updated Being a stay-at-home parent is a full-time job.

Even if you and your parents have a great relationship, you want to find your own path and make your own choices. Here are some tips to make it easier. Find something trivial to chat about each day. Talk about how your team did at the track meet. Share something one of your teachers said. If you feel your relationship with your parents is strained, try easing into conversations. Mention that cute thing the dog did. When parents feel connected to your daily life, they can be there for you if something really important comes up. Raising Difficult Topics Maybe you need to break bad news to a parent, like getting a speeding ticket or failing an exam. Here are 3 steps to help you prepare for that talk. What you hope to achieve can vary. So you can say why you want to talk in a way that communicates what you need. Can I tell you about it? Identify Your Feelings Things like personal feelings or sex are awkward to discuss with anyone, let alone a parent. But instead of letting those feelings stop you from talking, put them into words as part of the conversation. It can help to defuse things by beginning with a statement like, "Mom, I have something to tell you. But I know I need to tell you. Can you hear me out? Ask, "Can we talk? Is now a good time? When is a good time? Think ahead about what you want to say or ask. Write down the most important ideas if you need to. Emotions and past experiences can get in the way. Will parents take you seriously, believe what you say, listen to and respect your opinions, and hear you out without interrupting? A lot depends on your parent. Some parents are easy to talk to, some are great listeners, and some are harder to approach. But some of what happens depends on you, too. Since communication is a two-way street, the way you talk can influence how well a parent listens and understands you. So here are some guidelines to consider when talking to parents: Be clear and direct. Be as clear as you can about what you think, feel, and want. Give details that can help parents understand your situation. If you sometimes hide the truth or add too much drama, parents will have a harder time believing what you tell them. Try to understand their point of view. If you can, say so. Telling parents you understand their views and feelings helps them be willing to see yours, too. Try not to argue or whine. If you think your emotions might get the better of you, do something to blow off steam before talking: Go for a run. Do whatever it takes to sound calm when you need to. They might listen respectfully, understand your point of view, and do everything you need except say yes. It can be hard to take no for an answer. But gracefully accepting a no can help you get more yeses in the future. Some parents have troubles of their own. Others have a hard time being flexible. Find a relative, a teacher, or a counselor who will listen, understand, encourage, believe in you, and care. Acting respectfully demonstrates maturity. Parents are more likely to think of their children as grown up and, as a result, capable of making more important decisions when they see them acting maturely.

Chapter 4 : 3 Ways to Help Your Parents Earn Money - wikiHow

In both households the parents are made to feel in the way and in some respects they were. It was the cruelest kind of punishment to separate two people who spent half a century together. But that's what happens to both.

We trained thousands of early educators in developmental screenings, prekindergarten assessments and the Strengthening Families framework and, thanks to the groundwork done by our Vermont Community Preschool Collaborative, Vermont became the only state in the nation with publicly-funded pre-K for all 3- and 4-year olds. Unfortunately, though quality of child care in Vermont is increasing, availability of child care is not. Family child care operations are closing faster than they are opening. There was a net loss of registered home-based providers since June and a net loss of 1, licensed child care spaces since . Although policy changes, like Act , have been a step in the right direction, and enrollment of children in pre-K has dramatically increased, many communities still experience a lack of access to pre-K. Through Make Way for Kids, VB5 will work with communities across the state with projects such as the Burlington Early Learning Initiative to increase the availability of high-quality early care and learning programs, and our work in each area will be tailored to local needs. All projects are expected to be complete by the spring of . Organizations, businesses, schools, municipalities or agencies that currently operate or plan to operate a licensed child care or early education program. Currently registered family child care programs planning to expand to a licensed program. Individuals planning to open a registered family child care. Organizations that have previously received a MWFK grant may apply to fund a new project that increases access to high-quality child care. Projects that demonstrate a plan to significantly increase capacity in a high-needs community may be eligible to apply for additional funds. Eligibility to request funding at higher levels than outlined above will be identified during the consultation process between VB5 and the prospective applicant. Expenses Eligible for Funding Capital investments that result in new slots ready for enrollment by January 3, Family child care homes are only eligible to apply for major renovations or additions if the improvements are flagged by child care licensing as required to meet health and safety requirements to serve additional children i. Specific program quality improvement or workforce development efforts that will allow programs with 3 or fewer stars to achieve 4 or 5 stars by January 3, Equipment and materials needed to support early learning environments, physical health and the wellbeing of additional children served in newly created child care slots e. Training and compensation costs related to workforce development needed for program expansion. Other programs and projects that will increase the capacity of high-quality child care by January 3, For more information on grant eligibility, the grant process timeline, and to schedule a grant consultation meeting, please contact Sherry Carlson.

Chapter 5 : 10 Sure Ways to Get Whatever You Want From Your Parents | HuffPost

Here are some ways to put more of the fun kind of learning into your child's life: Value the park. Try to make time every day, if possible, to take your child to a playground or a public park.

Recently, I was called down to the main office in the middle of my planning period. I needed to pick up an item that a parent dropped off for their child. Thinking it was something like an inhaler or money for dinner, I was happy to go retrieve it. You know, one of those ounce insulated water bottles, barely bigger than a regular bottle of water. He was in a suit, clearly headed to work or something work-like. I took a deep breath through my nose. But you may not have heard of the latest term for a troubling trend recently identified in parenting: Lawnmower parents go to whatever lengths necessary to prevent their child from having to face adversity, struggle, or failure. I think that most lawnmower parents come from a good place. Maybe they experienced a lot of shame around failure as a child. Or maybe they felt abandoned by their parents in their moments of struggle, or dealt with more obstacles than most. Any of us—even non-parents—can empathize with the motivations of a person not wanting to see their child struggle. But in raising children who have experienced minimal struggle, we are not creating a happier generation of kids. We are creating a generation that has no what idea what to do when they actually encounter struggle. A generation who panics or shuts down at the mere idea of failure. A generation for whom failure is far too painful, leaving them with coping mechanisms like addiction, blame, and internalization. The list goes on. Indeed, childhood is when they learn these skills. I really need to study harder. I see similar versions of these same behaviors as a middle school teacher all the time. I wanted to ask. Anything less than perfectly comfortable? Of course, some parents have children who suffer from anxiety, depression, or other forms of mental illness. I have clinical anxiety that can feel crippling at times and that I struggled with often throughout my childhood. If we want our children to be successful, healthy adults, we must teach them how to process through their own challenges, respond to adversity, and advocate for themselves. This article by a college professor on lawnmower parents is worth checking out.

Chapter 6 : Make Way for Tomorrow () - IMDb

Your parents love you and look for opportunities to make your life better. They need to feel that you appreciate and deserve what you get. Learn how to ask and you will be rewarded.

No matter who your parents are, there are a few things that you can do to drastically increase the chance of having them say "YES" rather than "NO. Parents love to pretend they are cool and collected, but in reality, they are very predictable. So much so that I guarantee that if you read the tips below, you can improve your life in several ways! Your parents will allow you to do more, trust you more and be more willing to see life from your perspective. Try the tips below and let me know how they work out! Ask with gratitude, show appreciation! Nothing gets you a faster "No" from parents than giving them a feeling that they owe you or that you "deserve" things. Sure, they are responsible for your well-being and all that, but this is not an exercise in fairness. Saying, "Dad, can I have an Electric Guitar? This is really great, thank you. The point is not to trick your parents into thinking you care; the point is that appreciation spreads good will, which will certainly come back to you. Trade what you want for what you can do You may ask: They hold all the cards! Your parents care about one thing having to do with you almost more than anything: Your growing up into a responsible, happy adult. Any way you can show them that you are moving in the right direction will help your case endlessly. So, when asking for something, also offer something in return. Two things you can always offer are doing specific chores and getting better grades in specific topics. Being specific is important because that way, the results can be measured. Otherwise, your promise can have the opposite effect. Make them look good One thing your parents care about, whether they admit it or not, is how they appear to others. Adults often feel judged about their parenting skills, and any way you can help them to feel confident as parents is a good thing. So, when hanging around your parents in public, put your grown-up pants on. Make polite conversation with their friends. Answer their redundant questions as interestingly as possible. Contribute to the social scene. Match funds "Mom, I really need a new pair of jeans. I tried them on at the mall. If I pay for half of them with my babysitting money, can you contribute the rest? Mom will probably buy it for you outright! Earn credit, slowly When you want Mom or Dad to buy you something small, then just go ahead and ask. Figure out small things that will make you seem more responsible and do them. Offer to take on small responsibilities and always do what you said you would do and a tiny bit more. When that happens, asking for things will have a much higher rate of success. Be part of the solution, not the problem We all feel mistreated and deserving of more sometimes. Sometimes we really are. However, being mature sometimes means being happy with what we have! So, lower the rate of drama. When a sibling starts something, be the mature one and let it go. All this builds confidence and credit. I want you to think about it before answering. Stage your requests carefully Setting the stage for any question you want to pop is a key to increasing the odds for "Yes"! Follow these rules for shifting things in your favor: Figure out the reason they turned you down and then ask what you have to do to make it a "Yes. I want that too. How can I show you that? Your parents want to give you things! Your parents love you and look for opportunities to make your life better. They need to feel that you appreciate and deserve what you get. Learn how to ask and you will be rewarded.

Chapter 7 : Talking to Your Parents - or Other Adults

Make sure to communicate. If you have doubts, or are scared, do not feel as if you have to hide your feelings. Confide in a trusted sibling, or even talk to your parent about it.

Karen Nelson on August 2, ? Download your free family guides for school success, jam-packed with tips on how parents can support learning at home. When parents trust us, everything goes better. But how do you build that trust? Big and little gestures over the course of a school year can establish a strong relationship so that in the end, your classroom parents will be your biggest fans. We asked teachers for ideas. Here are 11 of our favorite tips. Bite the bullet and put in a few extra hours for this idea that yields a huge payoff. Call each family in your class yep, all 27 of them and check in with at least one parent per household within the first month of school. That feels like a lot to accomplish during the craziness that is the beginning of the school. But the rewards are huge. You can ensure that the first contact with the parent is positive Tip: One phone call can open the lines of communication and set the tone for the school year. Send old-fashioned snail mail. Even a photocopied form letter is a nice touch. If you have time, a handwritten note can add a little magic too, and you can even wait until the first day of school to send it home. Check out these sweet notes that Laura from The Core Inspiration wrote to her students on the first day of school. Parents relax and warm up a little when they feel like you really know their child. The Core Inspiration 3. Share pictures and videos of the school day. A lot of us parents are. Her teacher won me over when midway through the day, she texted me a picture of my 5-year-old baby smiling and having a blast on her first day of school. She continued to text pictures of big events throughout the entire school year. Five years later, I still treasure those pictures. Most of us, though, are a little reluctant to open ourselves up like that, which is why a parent-teacher communication app like Bloomz we reviewed it here last year can be such a lifesaver. You can easily text or email pictures and videos to one parent or all of them without giving up your personal information. Want your parents hugging you in gratitude on the very first morning of school? Have each child present this sweet poem to their parent at morning drop-off. If you really want to take it to the next level, try to grab snapshots of your kids before school starts we used our kindergarten round-up event and paste a photograph of each child next to the poem. An instant connection forms when parents feel like you really understand them—and that connection is often enough to last the whole school year. Make memory books with your students. Check out this post from the The Primary Pack , which shares a super-easy way to curate and assemble your memory books. Way easier than a bunch of late nights at the end of the school year! The Primary Pack 6. At my last school, we were fortunate that parents were really involved. They were also anxious about sending their child off to school and needed a little hand-holding. Many teachers are starting to use apps to make this kind of connection easier. All your parent connections can happen within the app, and you can keep all your parent contact information there too. Classroom news, sign-up sheets and just conversations can all happen digitally. I am able to message parents directly, send group messages, post PDFs, upload pictures of class to share with parents. Parents love to talk about their kids. If you give them an opportunity to share what they want you to know early in the year, you can save yourself some time later. A Differentiated Kindergarten 8. Share personal details about yourself but not too many! Once my classroom parents knew that I had school-age kids too, there was instant camaraderie. It could be a shared interest in cooking, sports or any number of things. One teacher I know connects with parents because she is a tried-and-true fan of our local football team. Everyone knows it and loves her for it, even if they root for the rival team. She even has a version you can edit to plug in your own information. Make a parent wish jar. Each parent jots down a quick wish for their child on back-to-school night. You can download this template from Funky First Grade Fun. Keep parents in the loop about good behavior and challenging behavior when you need to. Parents love hearing compliments about their children, and feedback from the teacher often carries more weight. You can use one of the cute forms we found below. Many teachers have also started to go digital when it comes to tracking and communicating about behavior and use an app for daily updates. Be awesome at your job! The truth is, one of the best teachers at my school is kind of awful when it comes to parent communication. He sends parents lots of conflicting emails with mixed-up dates. It helps with calendars and everything. Oh how I wish I could share a couple of links with him. And that earns him the adoration of both parents and kids. Find out more about the ways that the award-winning parent-teacher communication app Bloomz can help you connect with parents. Whether you just need to keep in touch or you need to organize classroom events, Bloomz can make it quicker and easier.

Chapter 8 : Take a Moment to Read These 15 Ways to Make Your Parents Proud

Edit Article How to Obtain Money from Your Parents. In this Article: Asking for Money When You Live at Home Asking for Money When You've Moved Out Community Q&A Children and young adults usually have few ways to make substantial income, yet need money from time to time.

Print On a recent stroll through the park, I watched two young boys at play. I could feel their excitement and joy as they chased each other in a spirited competition to see who could scoot up the slide, drop down the firepole, and kick a soccer ball the farthest. Over and over again they launched their game in breathless squeals of delight. I thought about how perfect this kind of play is for kids to learn a variety of skills and experience pure, safe, unbridled freedom. The boys reminded me of the same feelings I had running, climbing, and sliding in my younger days. If only we adults could recall that feeling more often, we might better appreciate the importance of free play in the lives of our children and create more time for it. We all know kids love to play. But we also must realize that our kids need to play to grow as people. Free unstructured play helps children build a wide range of skills necessary for success in school and out, from making friends and negotiating to problem solving, thinking creatively, and practicing self control. As a parent, you are in a terrific position to ensure that your child has plenty of time to get out there and play, especially during the more leisurely summer months. Testing the Waters Free play, or unstructured playtime, is the most reliable form of self-education and discovery children can have. It gives them a safe context to try out new life skills and ways of being. Through the open exploring and "testing" of play, children become aware that taking action really is what it takes in life to get what you need and want. Parents who understand the ego needs of their children know that their emotional health is promoted through play. He also gets a large dose of modern-day stress relief by just getting to be a kid. Unfortunately, over the past few years, the value our society places on play has evaporated like a puddle on a hot playground. There are many reasons for this phenomenon: Children develop a unique sense of self-worth from being creative. While finishing a tower of blocks, for example, your child may encounter a moment when the tower refuses to stand. It may even topple a few times. You watched your baby learn how to crawl, to stand, and eventually to walk. Fitting in Fun Carving out time from your busy schedule to give your child more opportunities for free play may not be easy. Try to make time every day, if possible, to take your child to a playground or a public park. Allow him to simply enjoy the jungle gym or kick a ball with no expectations. The physical activity will not only give him a chance to feel free and work those muscles , but it will also help tucker him out for naptime or bedtime. Get into the backyard. Going outdoors more, anywhere from the backyard to the backwoods, will give your child a chance to use his investigative powers to explore his surroundings. Let invention take over as he picks up sticks, digs in the mud to look for worms, or simply throws rocks into the water to watch the ripples. Kids learn how to socialize from direct interaction or from simply watching other kids. The cooperative play that results can take place anywhere, at your home or in the park. Kids have a built-in need to express themselves. Keep these materials on hand: Dress-up costumes and props. During make-believe, kids can try on adult personas and experiment with solving "real-life situations. Paper-towel rolls, plastic bottle caps, and scraps, blocks, sand, mud, and water. Allow your child to make whatever he wants from these items and hold no expectations. Without pressure to produce a recognizable finished product, your child will feel capable of dealing with openness and ambiguity. After all, studies show that children who have freedom of creative expression grow up to be thoughtful, tolerant adults who think well on their feet. That makes for a winning resume. But the bottom line is:

Chapter 9 : How to Communicate with Parents â€¢ ZERO TO THREE

Make mornings count. Most families don't eat enough fiber on a daily basis, and breakfast is an easy place to sneak it in. Look for high-fiber cereals for a quick fix.

Check new design of our homepage! But we can be good human beings and make them feel proud. Through little acts of kindness, we can show them that we care. AptParenting gives you some ways to make your parents feel proud of you. AptParenting Staff Last Updated: Mar 21, "The fact is, my parents loved me, and I wanted to be worthy of their love. I wanted to make them proud. They influence our lives in so many ways. They teach us almost everything about living, they give us the strength of character, and make us who we are. It is because of them that we become capable of handling responsibilities. The things that we are capable of doing are actually their gifts to us. Right from taking care of us when we were young to guiding us whenever we need their advice, they are always there by our side. All we can do for them is to give them love and happiness. Through little gestures like helping them, sharing some of their responsibilities, and most importantly, by living by the principles they taught us, we can make them proud. It could be about eating healthy, exercising regularly, or praying daily. It could be about staying away from bad habits like smoking or drinking, or it could be about following a particular lifestyle. Make your parents proud by following what they taught you. Learn to appreciate and love the things that are with you. Be content with what your parents give you; you may not know their struggle in giving you that. Being too demanding or showing discontent might hurt them or make them feel insufficient. Take Your Own Decisions Start taking your own decisions wisely and with confidence. In other words, take control of your life by deciding what would be good or bad for you. Let them see that you are independent. Seeing that you are capable of taking your decisions and being responsible for their consequences, will make your parents feel proud of you. Little Things Matter Through small things like wishing them on their birthdays and their wedding anniversary, make them feel loved. Once in a while, plan a small outing with them, or a surprise gift or party. Give them something they had wanted, gift them something they would like to have. Cook for them, or take them out for lunch or dinner. What will matter to them, is that you took some time out to spend in their company. Take a few minutes from your busy day to call them up, ask how they are doing. These little actions that show them your love and concern will make them feel proud. Share Their Responsibilities Helping your parents with their work will give them some time for themselves. Sharing some of their work will lessen their burden. Take up some tasks like buying the groceries, cleaning the house, cooking, serving meals, doing the dishes, mowing the lawn, washing the car, etc. This way, you will relieve your parents of some of their work and make them feel proud that you helped. Appreciate What They Do for You It is important to appreciate the things that your parents do for you. They take care of your food, your health, and your moods. They are always ready to get you anything you need and give you the best of everything. When is the last time you said a "thank you" to them? Through your behavior or your words, show them that you realize what they are doing for you and that you value them more than anyone else. Make Them Your Friends Share little things with your parents and make them feel involved in your life. Share the smallest of your achievements with them. It will only make them happy. Share your failures with them, they will never laugh at your mistakes. Let them know about when you would be coming home, whether you would be having dinner with them, and other such things about your daily schedule. Keeping them informed about your whereabouts tells them that you care. Never lie to your parents. Be honest, be open, and make them your friends. Be Hardworking Aim high, work hard, and give your best to everything that you do. What matters most to your parents is your hard work and focus. Seeing your sincerity and dedication towards your work makes them feel content. Your parents want you to be capable enough to achieve what you want, they want you to pursue your dreams, and work towards realizing them. Seeing that you have an aim in life and that you are working towards it to the best of your abilities, will make them feel proud. Help them with their studies and other things. Behave responsibly if you are the elder one. When the children in the family share a healthy relationship, it makes the parents feel happy and proud. Take Care of Your Grandparents Help in looking after your grandparents. Your parents will appreciate this. Be a Good

Human Being Be polite, caring, generous, and respectful to your family and friends. Value the principles that your parents taught you. When they give an advice or suggestion, consider taking their ideas into account. Do not argue or be disrespectful. Learn to admit mistakes. Seeing you grow into a good human being will surely make your parents proud. Distinguish Between Good and Bad Stay away from bad people and wrong things. Make friends who care about you and who can help you to forge ahead in life. Your parents will be proud of you when they know that you can distinguish between the good and the bad. Spend Time With Your Parents Spend time with your parents instead of surfing the internet, playing games, or watching television. Go out together for a vacation, or for shopping, buying groceries, or a simple walk. Have your meals together. Be prompt to help those in need. It could be your mother, father, any other family member, or friend. Be ready to help anyone who needs it. Show That You Care By walking on the path they showed you, by living with the good habits they cultivated in you as a kid, and by growing up into a wonderful person, you can show them how much you love them and make them proud parents. Treat them with respect, give them care, and let them know that you love them as much as they love you. Make them feel loved and involved. Make them proud of you.