Ed Cunningham Eugene S. Boerner was born of German parents in Wisconsin, in He served as a pilot in WW I. Kitty Belendez at www. For those seeking a concise over-view of what Floribundas are, this site gives a nice over-view of the whole Floribunda family, written by Kitty. In the course of this commerce in new roses, there was also much social and intellectual traffic between the continents. Boerner was also friendly with many others in the rose industry, including Edward LeGrice, who had an interest in unusually colored roses. Also, "when a young Ulsterman named Sam McGredy came to him for advice, he received him generously. Sam, who had been given the task of breeding roses, but no knowledge of it, owned that Gene had been a kind of hybridizing father to him. But, in the midst of all this social rose commerce, along came WW-II. In addition to the obvious human toll, it was a disaster for the European rose industry. The mainland was devastated, and during the recovery, roses were a luxury. England had relied on the continent for a large supply of assorted, cheap rootstock, as well as some newly hybridized cultivars each year. In the American Rose Annual , p. This is mainly due to government restrictions on land that can be used for growing rose plants. Some growers who formerly produced , plants for sale have budded only 20, for the past two seasons. Some growers this season have had to go to their customers to secure propagating eyes. Even after the war is over, it will require some time to regain our former position as a rose country. Although the exhibitions of the National Rose society could not be held this year, there is no diminution of the public interest Some of his more renowned introductions include: Help-Me-Find is the best way I know of for interested folk to look these roses up, and to see pictures. In his breeding program, he utilized many roses. Sort of like "standing on his own shoulders," so to speak. I explored the ancestry of a lot of roses that I liked. Some of the biggest name ancestors kept popping up everywhere. Included in the "frequent flyers" was Lavender Pinocchio by Boerner. It is one of the "brown" or "coffee colored" roses. And more than any other color of rose, brown roses are subject to that variability. These changes can be governed by soil type, overall climate, differences in local weather, changes of season, and even variations in the amount or strength of sunlight a rose receives. This particular "issue" of that website is a true wonder to behold. If you have any interest at all in these roses, do not miss this issue of this website. Aloha is thrice a parent, and 31 times a grand-parent, for Austin alone! First Prize was no slouch in this arena either. But, Goldilocks is the winner, with page after page of descendants. The fact that Bridal Pink, Bridal White a sport of Bridal Pink found by and attributed to Warriner and First Prize are still highly rated and broadly grown more than thirty years after their introduction is a remarkable achievement. If he did not wow us with hot-colored roses, he certainly gave us a significant number of solid, beautiful ones. No less important are his shrub and climbing roses Aloha, Coral Dawn, and Parade. Aloha is still widely loved and distributed and Parade won from the RHS its award of garden merit some forty years after its introduction. But who was the man? He was the man who had mercy on an orphaned? He was the man who, as his life was drawing to a close in , had mercy on a new widow and offered her the white rose that he had intended for himself, and instead dedicated it as a tribute to her assassinated husband. He was the man who, when he died on , left a large legacy to Cornell University to support graduates working on rose research Value for Money, by Lt. Please e-mail us with any website problems.

Biography[ edit ] Henry Bennett was a cattle and wheat farmer in Stapleford in the mids. He married Emma Rebbeck in July , and they had 8 children: Charlotte Emma died in infancy. Henry Bennett decided that the future was not in cattle and wheat, but a new source of income was going to be necessary, and that would be roses. In , he bought his first roses and planted them on the farm, to propagate for sale. His knowledge of cattle breeding suggested to him that he might be able to make great advances in rose cultivation by applying the same principles to rose breeding â€” that of using known parents, selected for the qualities desired in the progeny. His first efforts were unsuccessful, so from to he visited successful rose hybridizers in France. He also saw that he was fighting an uphill battle with the cool damp English climate, which did not provide enough summer heat to ripen rose hips. He also kept his parent plants in pots. This system allowed him to work nearly year-round with Tea roses, and gave him a much longer bloom season with the Hybrid Perpetuals. While developing his own roses, he introduced and sold roses acquired from other breeders. The two surviving daughters Maria and Mary, then 16 and 11, took over running the household. From then on, he was no longer a farmer, but a rose hybridiser. He travelled to the US in to study rose growing in America. He was introducing some of his roses in the US before introducing them in the UK. His youngest son Edmund introduced the rose Captain Hayward posthumously, in New rose varieties were often introduced at its rose shows. Bennett showed some of his acquisitions in , but did not show or introduce his own roses until At that time he introduced 10 roses, with named parentage, which he called Pedigree Hybrids of the Tea Rose. He was the first to publish and guarantee the parentage of his roses. None of these roses are still in commerce, however. It was decided at this meeting that Bennett had created an entirely new class of roses, and that it would be called Hybrid Tea. In , the National Rose Society introduced the Gold Medal, awarded to the most outstanding new rose introduced at one of its rose shows.
