Raising caring kids who are well-mannered can be a challenging task, but there are a few basics that can help pave the way. Teach your child the importance of thanking people for gifts and other acts of kindness. For example, encourage him to express his appreciation by saying or writing a prompt and personal thank you note for birthday gifts on special stationery or note cards. A preschooler can dictate his words to you and draw a picture or sign his name. School-age children can even send an email to thank someone. Make your empathy visible. Help your child understand that teasing a friend or saying unkind things will make others feel bad. Ask questions such as, "How would you feel if someone pointed at you and started to laugh? Let your children know how proud you are when you "catch" them being polite. Before long, good manners will become second nature to them. Show your disapproval and explain why. When children misbehave, they need us to tell them that we expect more from them and explain what "more" is. The National Association of Elementary School Principals offers parents these additional ideas to help raise children with good manners: Help your child use words, not actions. Play out some of the situations with which your child is having trouble, and show her how to respond calmly and firmly with words instead of actions. Children must understand that they have to wait for their turns, just like everyone else. The playground provides education in this area: The same goes for interrupting. Help your children understand the importance of sharing with others in school and in life. Encourage good behavior by complimenting them when you see them sharing with others. Provide rest and good nutrition. Children tend to behave badly when they are tired or hungry. Make sure they get enough sleep and nutritious food. While "fessing up" to misbehavior is sometimes difficult and painful for children, they must understand that honesty is the best policy. We all want our children to be respected and well-liked by others. The best way to practice having great manners is to be nice to mom, dad, and siblings. This is when most of us are at our worst. Preschool children are just beginning to develop empathy and understanding that the world involves some pretty complicated rituals. Young school-age children are still sorting through what is rude and what is exuberant. Refinement of social skills can take years to master. By doing the best you can most of the time and expecting the most from your children with your gentle guidance, parents will see good behavior they can be proud of.
