Were you familiar at all with the Henning Mankell Wallander books before being approached by Martin? This is a great opportunity. What has the response been to the song since Wallander started airing in ? I think there were 13 million people watching it in the UK alone. But it was great. I just noticed people starting to come to the shows more, and it also led to sort of further opportunities in TV and film. I, I really love the series. I love it! It surprises me every single time it begins and I hear my voice come on. I did write it when I was in Melbourne. I was visiting Melbourne for the first time, and it was a strange thing because, I felt really far away from home still even though I was in my country of birth. And I fell in love with Melbourne completely. Was that something that you wanted to achieve? Capturing that mood and it! It, it feels chilly and cold, which actually quite suits the Swedish setting of the series. It was about this time eight years ago actually, and it was quite unusual weather for the time of year, but it just, you know, out of nowhere, started really tipping down the snow, and we only had four days to make our album. We sort of were able to piece their lives together a bit more. What can you share about your experiences in making the documentary? He basically finds all the locations in various films or television series that he loves. And he did it for BBC Wallander and so he knows the people who own the houses where the scenes of Wallander were shot. So he ended up coming over and meeting me. So I changed that. It seemed too English in a way, and it! Yeah. Too pastoral or something. So it was good to take those out and put the piano in there. And it left it a bit more open and a bit more spacious, which I think it needed. Do you foresee composing more for film and television in the future? I would love to do more. I just love it. Emily Barker, thank you so much. Thank you so much for having me. Kathy Tu is our editor. Rachel Aronoff is our production coordinator. Special thanks to Barrett Brontas and Nathan Tobey.
