Posted on September 17, by Scott Boulton, CHRP One of the smartest things that professionals can do is to make sure that they are always managing their personal brand. Essentially, your personal brand is the bits and pieces that make up who you are as a working professional. There are other elements of your personal brand that important to maintain such as how you network, how you market yourself and how you represent yourself in social media. All of these elements must be skillfully maintained, cultivated and managed by you on a regular basis. If ever a piece of your personal brand falls out of alignment with the rest of your brand composition, than your overall personal brand suffers. The importance of maintaining your personal brand cannot be overstated. It plays such a huge part in your career trajectory and personal job satisfaction, whether you realize it or not! The best advice I give people IMHO is when I advise people to always be managing their personal brand hence the reason for this blog post! Me, Myself and I Inc. Essentially, this line of thinking keeps everything in alignment for you from a personal branding perspective. If you think of yourself as a company, your own individual entity, than your brand IS your company and your company is your brand. Who you currently work for plays a big role in the decisions you make and how they align with your personal brand. A lot of times many times what is best for Me, Myself and I Inc. That is, decisions that cause you to apply for internal promotions, volunteer for project teams or support your colleagues are what are best for you and your company. Better yet, the day to day decision you make to show up to work and do a good job is most certainly in the best interest of My, Myself and I Inc. The tricky part comes when those two things what is best for you vs your company are at odds. When conflicted with career choices and decisions, I always advise people to make a decision in the best interest of Me, Myself and I Inc. Sometimes this may involve someone moving on to perceived greener pastures. Sometimes this change is good for you and for your company. Perhaps you have grown stale in your role and with your company and you both need a change. Sometimes a change of scenery is good for both parties. In other situations, you may find yourself at moral or ethical odds with the company you work for. Perhaps the new line of business they opened up conflicts with your morals or beliefs? Sometimes how they treat employees in general during difficult time gives you pause for thought. Either way, you own your career and you own your brand, so you need to make a decision that is in alignment with this brand and that is best for Me, Myself and I Inc. My intent here is not to put you at odds with your current employer, but to give you cause to pause and reflect on your personal brand, how you currently have it defined and what it means to you in your current role and for your career overall. The bottom line is that you need to make sure you are making decisions in the best interests of Me, Myself and I Inc. Think of your brand and what drives you to make the career decisions that you have made so far. What has led you down this path? What has caused you to be successful? Then, stick to this personal brand charter and act accordingly. As always, I welcome your comments and feedback.

Wield those words skillfully and people may perceive you in any number of positive lights--as intelligent, poised, persuasive, funny, to name a few. But even one little grammatical slip can have the opposite effect. Here are 10 more to add to the list. Irregardless and unthaw These are not words. Bring and take When using these words as commands think in terms of direction. People bring things toward you and take things away from you. As for "myself," only use it if "me" or "I" would sound awkward in its place, such as "I kept the secret to myself. Because "affected" is what you really mean and once upon a time "impact" was used strictly as a noun. Just think of the "a" in "affect" also is used in "action," which is what verbs do. Loose and lose The first one means your dog escaped his kennel, your change is clinking in your pocket, or your clothes are too big. Overuse of apostrophes Apostrophes indicate one of two things: Same thing with your last name. Principle and principal These words are easily confused. One definition for "principle" is "a moral rule or belief that helps you know what is right and wrong and that influences your actions," according to Merriam-Webster. Lay and lie Generally, if you can replace the word in question with some variant of "put" or "place," use "lay. For example, it should be "Mark lay on the bed after coming home from work yesterday. Check out her advice for navigating this minefield. Borrow and lend Some people incorrectly use the word borrow instead of lend. It would be wrong to say "He borrowed me his car for the afternoon" or "Can you borrow me a dollar? Just remember, the person doing the giving lends and the person receiving something borrows it.
