What made this eerier for me is that I was at Exeter with Howard Brookner, the semi-subject of this tragic romance. We were never cool, and never involved in the art and film scene as Brad and Howard were; but we knew people who were. We were on the edge of that world of beautiful men and hot clubs and sexual freedom. From our leafy suburban hilltop we could see the lights of Manhattan. Reading this wonderful, heart-breaking book is like watching a car crash in slow motion. We saw it happen too many times in our own world. AIDS paid no attention to issues of bridge and tunnel. The book is filled with wry honesty and genuine humor. The siren song of the s was a very strong one. It was not conducive to neat pairings or cautious behavior. The conscious desire on the part of both Brad and Howard to turn their backs on the bland suburban world of their parents simply added fuel to the fire. And yet, there is a kind of kids-in-a-candy-store innocence about their headlong plunge into the bars and baths of Manhattan. Oddly, I thought of Dorothy and her companions arriving in the Emerald City in the film version of The Wizard of Oz, as they indulge in all the urban wonders of that magical place before facing the terror of the wizard himself. He teaches at a university in New Jersey but still lives in Manhattan. That his life should end up so oddly parallel to my own simply underscores the dark whimsy of the world gay men all over the USA lived through together in the s and infuses this big-hearted biographical narrative with a bittersweet poignancy that makes it particularly powerful.

I learned what being away from your girlfriend and family was really like – how you looked forward to the mail from home for some contact with what you left, and how to get along with all types. I make no mention of the destruction, hunger, injured, dying or dead that civilian or military went through. He was drafted into the Army in and headed to basic training in Fort Eustes, Virginia. Howard recalls enjoying himself while at the rifle range, but a lieutenant became frazzled when seeing the way Howard held and fired his weapon. That is, until he discovered Howard had a nearly perfect firing score. It seems that Howard had a habit of doing things differently than the rule book. Seeing the company commander miss his target using anti-aircraft machinery, Howard hopped up into the ring mount and opened fire at the invitation of the commander. He and others would scour the roads post-battle and find machinery to salvage, often at the risk of their own lives. That moment stuck with him all through the war and especially the next day as he arrived at the wasteland of Normandy Beach. Given a map, he was directed to deliver his tank to the requested location and then head back to his unit. With German bombers filling the sky and enemies hidden in random locations, Howard delivered his tank and then proceeded back to his unit alone and on foot. Nowadays, they tell soldiers to talk about their experiences in order to work through them. There is much untold history from WWII simply because we were told not to speak of it. Writing it all down, however, helps. His memoirs scratch the surface of a fascinating part of history. Once discharged, Howard returned to Montesano to start his family where he has lived ever since. His story of trial and victory is little known, neatly stashed in a blue binder for future generations to discover. This kind of history needs to be told, heard, preserved, and honored. Thank you, Howard, for your service to your country.
