As the soil, heavy with the burden of countless burials, fell onto my friend's coffin I thought of the many journeys he had made. Always in a hurry - always with something important ahead, whether heading off to a war zone, a theatrical performance or a rendezvous - yet always calm.

This covers trade routes and practices in different areas of the world during the late 14th through early 16th centuries. The remainder of this answer is pulled in great part from what I understood of the book. Water ways are preferred due to a lower rate of banditry. Numbers mean a lot. Whenever you get two different groups with two different goals, e. If a merchant convoy is large enough, it would be a significant deterrent to a pirate with only one or two ships. Because of this, it is much easier to have a larger band with which to attach merchant convoys. Thus, land routes had a higher rate of banditry and it would take greater numbers to deter bandit attacks. Why are deserts safer? The deserts are harder on travel and sustenance. During the late 13th and early 14th centuries, there were four towns in the area of Champagne which had regularly scheduled and rotating fairs. The fair would stay in each town for a couple of months before moving to the next. Each town encouraged trade of particular wares, so merchants interested in buying or selling particular items would know when to be where. For the fairs to be successful, the lords of these towns and their surrounding areas had to secure the safety of the merchants traveling to the fairs. When this guarantee was no longer provided, the merchants sought other venues. Europe was behind the times, though. Note that the title of the book clearly indicates a time before Europe dominated world trade. The Italians, being closer to the traders from the Middle East and discouraging direct trade between the rest of Europe and the Middle East, were more familiar with many of the trading practices of the Middle East. This included loan instruments and various forms of housekeeping. Often, there would be a partnership between merchants. The one partner, usually the one with more invested financially, would stay in a shop or warehouse in the home town while the less invested financially would invest his safety into acquiring and transporting goods. In the Indian Ocean, there were a few cities that became merchant cities. The weather patterns in the Indian Ocean prescribed travel in particular directions. Merchants could only practically travel east in the spring and west in the fall. During the summer, they would set up shop in the area of Sumatra and, during the winter, set up shop near the straits leading either into the Persian Gulf or the Red Sea. In short, the book covers key elements to a healthy economy and illustrates them several times. A healthy economy requires safety at home, safety to produce materials beyond what is necessary to subsist. A healthy economy requires safety along trade routes, safety to travel to a buyer willing to purchase your excess. A healthy economy requires a consistent schedule, safety to know that, when you get to your buyer, your buyer will be able to purchase your excess.

Speak with a Merchant Account Expert Today! The story consists of two-parts risk and one-part overcoming. They pay in advance and the travel business receives the money. Then a week before the trip the traveler or a loved one gets sick or they cancel because of work and all the sudden want a refund. The business, knowing the money will be there in a few weeks, delays. Many credit card processing companies choose the easy solution for them and deny a merchant account for the travel business. Luckily, Durango Merchant Services is not one of those companies. Entrepreneurship is, after all, about risk and reward, living our dreams, and helping others live theirs. Overcome the hurdles, and secure a travel merchant account: So, now that you know why travel industry merchant accounts are considered high risk, what can you do about it? An important fact to accept out of the gate is that if you are a new company with a weak or non-existent record, you will be required to accept a highly managed relationship. If you have a solid record of risk, fraud and chargeback management, you will still be required to provide at least 6 months of prior financials to prove it. The sunny side of this is that if you can make it 3 years demonstrating that you know how to successfully manage risk and keep chargebacks and customer disputes at bay, trust will have been earned and you will have more leverage to negotiate a better deal, with better rates and less restrictions. First, know what not to do. If these processors receive any signal that you are high risk, there is a chance that the merchant account will be terminated, which will cause problems in two ways. The good news is that you are already half way thereâ€well, technically you are here, doing it now. Finding consultants who specialize in the helping high risk merchants find a good home. Seeking out travel merchant account providers that pride themselves on integrity and search for lasting solutions, not the easiest or cheapest thing. Through decades of combined experience and a proven track record for service and reliability, we can confidently say that we are one of the best. Here are a few common strategies that can be employed to help secure a travel merchant account for your company. We will work with you to find the best one or combination of a few. Develop and put into action a strong and vetted fraud prevention plan. This may entail an analysis of your current fraud prevention processes and introduction to new tools that will help you detect and fight fraud. It will require that you are proactive in identifying and correcting potential weaknesses in your processing cycle. Purchase a financial failure insurance plan to bolster financial security. Build risk management into pricing by taking a small deposit upfront to secure the spot for your customer and charge the balance due 30 days before the trip starts. In most cases, individually or together, the above actions will be enough to secure a travel merchant account. Sometimes, underwriters will see something that raises a red flag and reject an application. If this happens, we may try to negotiate with the fulfilling bank to accept a cash reserve or deferred settlement of payments. Durango Merchant Services works with several gateway processors and suppliers with sponsor banking relationships that provide both US based national and international credit card processing solutions. We can provide merchant accounts for the travel and tourism companies under one of the following two options: Requirements to open a merchant account for travel businesses in the USA: Company entity based in the USA. The Domesday Book Merchants in the middle ages were business people who participated in retail and trade. Thus, the medieval merchant was seen as both a trader and trafficker of wares across countries. The middle ages merchant sourced for his products during his travels and would then sell them in markets and shops or at fairs. Early Beginnings Medieval society divided itself between three societal categories that included the clergy, the peasants and the fighters. Merchants were not considered as part of these three categorizations and were largely discriminated against. The clergy, the peasants and the nobility considered the merchant as one who was seeking to enrich himself at the expense of society. Meanwhile this same society increasingly depended on merchants for the distribution of much needed goods. In the early emergence of the merchant class, the clergy was vehemently opposed to merchant activities such as banking and trading. As such, people would blame the merchants for natural catastrophes including disease, floods or famine as a punishment to the community from God. Notably, the nobility were particularly disdainful of the merchants who, in the eyes of the nobility, were perceived as misers. The role of the merchant became even more important and entrenched in society in the wake of the thirteenth and the fourteenth centuries. The nobility became richer and the peasants were better placed to purchase goods that the merchants came with from other countries. The main merchant traders were the Genoese and Venetians. Merchants in the middle ages engaged in fierce confrontations over trade routes, through which they brought in good such as silk, perfumes, foods and spices. The Crusades , some of the bloodiest wars of the middle ages were not just about religion, they were also about different groups of merchants seeking to gain control of the major trade routes. Merchants earned a position as those who worked, but their social standing was certainly much higher than that of the peasants. As the peasants toiled in the field and the lords made merry in their castles, the merchants in the middle ages were busy travelling across the Mediterranean and Europe. By the fourteenth century, merchants were some of the wealthiest people in society; they held influential positions in local government and their children intermarried with those of the noblemen. Impact of Merchant Trade As the merchants crossed foreign boundaries, they would face resistance from local rulers. However, both the rulers and the merchants found a way out of this quagmire; the merchants would offer gifts to the local rulers or pay a fine. The local rulers would also tax the goods that merchants traded within their territory. To be sure, merchants increasingly became not part of middle ages feudal community, but influencers of this society. It is through their trade initiatives that towns and entire cities were built and developed for example the city of Paris in France. The towns that were initially small and tied to the feudal system became self-sustaining and broke away from the feudal system to become independent states. However, local lords did not take the independence of towns and cities lightly. Merchants, the lords and sometimes the king would fight over land issues because the merchants had become wealthy enough to purchase their own lands. The king and the local lords charged the merchants heavily for them to acquire land rights. The merchants and other town leaders sought to have towns that were independent from local lords and that were led by a mayor who was democratically elected. Tensions also emerged between local merchants and those who came into the towns for brief commercial activities. The local merchants in the middle ages could not keep up with the competitive edge that was accorded the merchant guilds. The merchant associations or guilds had more goods and could deliver their services more efficiently compared to a single local trader. More and more people forsook the local merchants and opted to do business with the new suppliers who offered cheaper goods and services. Even as some merchants grew richer, many commercial towns were ruined as local merchants ran out of business. Although the commercial activities of merchants gave rise to commercial cities and towns, these towns began to face unprecedented problems. These problems are similar to those faced by modern day urban cities; they included contagious disease, overcrowding and crime. The Medieval Merchant Guilds Merchants in the middle ages began to form merchant guilds, what we now know as associations or co-operatives. These guilds not only regulated and streamlined trade by they also made negotiations between the traders and local rulers easier. The main areas of contention were the taxes and levies that the local rulers imposed on the traders and the goods they traded. The merchant guilds developed and established the rules of trade. Members of these guilds became influential in medieval society. For example, the main spokesperson of the merchant guild would often be appointed as the city or town mayor. The chief delegates of the guild would be appointed as the town Aldermen and other guild members became city or town burghers. Common rules that the merchant guild established included a total ban on illegal trade by those who were not members of the guild. This was intended to make every merchant a member of the guild so that traders would work within this system. Members who went contrary to the guild rules or charter would pay a fine. The merchant guild offered assistance to their members and their families, in the event of sickness or death. Guild members also received protection against damages caused to their goods, and possessions as they travelled.

Always in a hurry – always with something important ahead, whether heading off to a war zone, a theatrical performance or a rendezvous – yet always calm. He knew he would be on time. He knew that wherever he went, to favorite haunts or the ends of the earth, he would find old friends or make new ones, he would learn all there was to learn in order to complete his mission well. I thought of the languages he spoke, which opened roads for him. But his native tongue was that which Apollonius of Tyana used when he said that he understood all languages: His language was his need to communicate, to travel, to live life to the full. I thought of the eternal winds that drive Greeks to seek their fortunes across the globe, through need, ambition or curiosity. My grandfather, the son of Greek immigrants to Egypt, picked up his young family from Port Said and moved them to Upper Egypt, to Aswan. The assault of sand and ash is merciless. Born in Africa, with my other grandparents in a mountain village on Crete, I learned of the sweeping changes that follow political earthquakes, such as the end of colonization, such as war. Some I lived through, in Mozambique and South Africa. My father and his sister, after losing their father, left Egypt in their youth during the war, to find relatives in South Africa. Like so many who are forced to move across the world, in all eras. My grandfather remembered that, just or-so years earlier, villagers had wept as their Turkish-Cretan neighbors were forced to leave in the great exchange of populations which saw the end of the Greek presence in Asia Minor. All of Greece is a museum filled with fragments and absences, a plain on which people and memories flow back and forth. And each one of our lives is a moment that seems stable and full because the leaf on which we stand runs, momentarily, at the same speed as the dark river that carries us. That river took many beloved people these last years. Each was different in his own way, distinguished by achievements in different spheres. In the arts, in business, in professions and journalism. Our greatest – if not our only – consolation is the fact that we were lucky to know them. Father, mentors, beloved friends, each gave more than he expected in return. All had something in common, the thing that set them apart – they lived lives full of adventure and reversals, they wanted to conquer time and distance, to learn, to create, to give. Live, live with strength and desire, push beyond the horizon, beyond the peaks that you see. To achieve this, though, you must be open to others, you must know what is common to all people, you must give and take. Apollonius knew many tongues through the arrogance of what he believed were divine powers. The people I speak of could communicate with everyone – Greeks and foreigners, paupers and kings – because they could see, they could hear, they could think. They were not arrogant but rich with the humility that only people of good will can share, which is the only way to open hearts and create opportunities. In this way, each succeeded in his own way. Some had families, others not. Some were famous and rich, others just got by. All enjoyed the love and appreciation of those who knew them, of those who knew how to see. I believe that each felt that the world, despite its pain and dangers, offers joy and opportunity. They had faith in life and they inspired faith in others. Waves of young people are leaving Greece, perhaps with the consoling thought that our age allows for easy travel, that they will be citizens of the world rather than emigrants. They will be fortunate if they achieve this, if they can combine the joys of Greece with the opportunities that can be found abroad. Gradually, though, many will take root in distant lands. Their dowry is not only the education that their country and parents provided, but the deep-rooted ability to feel that the whole world is their home. Greeks settled across the globe not only because the winds drove them forward, nor only because they had to travel. They went to the ends of the earth and succeeded, even in difficult times, because they could. Because they were open to life, to adventure, to discovery.
