He is considered to be very handsome by the public. He wears a white jacket over his gray shirt with a green circle necklace and black trousers. During the battle against the Deep Sea King , he was sporting a shorter hairstyle with his hair parted to the left. He is seen with longer hair when he addresses the Hero Association official and in his most recent appearance, he is again shown with his short hair. There is no mercy in his heart. A strong hatred for everything evil, eager to eliminate them all. He appears to be quite popular and has quite a charismatic way of talking. He also genuinely cares for the well-being of the citizens around him and actually wishes happiness upon every living thing in the universe. He is shown to have a burning hatred for anything that he sees as evil. Anything that he declares as evil must be swiftly and thoroughly exterminated. He notes that only promotions to S-Class or A-Class are fit for his attention, as they are the heroes who draw the most attention from the public, and hence, any heroes in those ranks who earn themselves negative reputations would drag his reputation down as well. Sweet Mask is very narcissistic about "beauty overwhelming the power", as he said about his philosophy that "heroes have to be beautiful as well". The following section contains Webcomic spoilers. You have been warned, manga-only readers. However, after witnessing the defeat of Garou by Saitama , his viewpoint changes and becomes more focused on the overwhelming power of the individual than beauty alone. He claims that he is stronger than Atomic Samurai and is even confident enough in his abilities to stand up to other S-Class heroes, such as Flashy Flash. He chooses not to advance so as not to allow weaklings to rank up. However, Fubuki changes her mind after witnessing Saitama defeat Garou and going toe-to-toe with Tatsumaki. He appears to be extremely fast as he was able to kill a group of captured alien invaders, apparently slicing them through with his bare hand in a flash; with none of the nearby S-Class heroes being fast enough to stop him. More remarkably, he managed to fight off several of clones of Black Sperm , a Dragon level monster. He quickly and effortlessly defeats Suppon, breaking both his legs with one kick and smashing his head with a one-inch punch. He was able to lift a boulder much larger than he is with ease, as well as throwing it with great force. Possibly due to his abnormal body, Sweet Mask seemed to feel no pain upon being pierced through the chest by Evil Natural Water, and resumed fighting normally. Through unknown means, Sweet Mask was somehow able to reattach his severed arm in his battle against the Monster Association. According to himself, he was able to reattach it, as it was "a clean cut. This is first seen in his battle against Garou in the webcomic. Sweet Mask defeats his opponents with swift movements and powerful blows, which makes him an extremely impressive fighter. Despite being unable to fight back, he took no notable damage against Fuhrer Ugly , a Disaster Level Dragon monster. It is unknown if this was due to his willpower or not.

Comments 83 The Indian actors, the brightest of them, are popular far beyond the borders of their country. They are special, unique, you not to meet such masters in the film industry of other states. The main line of their originality is fine ability to combine in the work talent drama, comedy, musical. All popular actors of Bollywood are able to sing and dance, during performance of creative numbers they are direct, very sincerely. They can express character of the heroes not only in words, behavior, acts, but even in a mimicry, in a look, in a smile or in turning of the head. It is pleasant to look at these masters, their playing always causes pleasant emotions. The Indian actors differ from other stars not only externally, and also by a playing manner: The viewer who got used to serious faces of the European or American artists is very much imposed by emotionally of actors from India. Any emotions are reflected in their face, emotions fill all movie. And in combination with naive and a little fantastic plot of the Indian melodramas or fighters, such emotionally of a mimicry looks harmoniously and it gives pleasure. But do not think that Indian actors are gaining popularity and importance in the field of film industry only thanks to the bright appearance and musical, dancing abilities. And for talent they are so loved by the audience on all continents. Many Bollywood actors are in family relations, in it some feature, specifics of a film world of India. To become known and demanded, they need to show talent, skill and persistence. Work of the actor has to be bright, expressive, memorable. Favorite Indian actors cope with such task at the high professional level. The same stars create interesting images both in comedy, and in melodramatic pictures, and in fighters. In Bollywood removed a large number of artists, charismatic and passionate man, charming and gentle women. Constantly there are new faces, young, talented. THE number of Christian biographies continually issuing from the press, of the class to which that whose title is above given belongs, is a notable literary feature of the modern time. Which vital phenomenon is a comment on the state and prospect of Christianity of the clearest significance. But to proceed to the memoir before us. Its subject, which one is obliged to say is its principal merit, was the third son of the eighth Earl of Kintore. He was born in Edinburgh in His descent was illustrious through a long line; one of his ancestors having been Frederick the Great's famous Marshal Keith, and others of them men of renown in the history of Scotland. Of his parents, it must suffice to remark that they were worthy of their rank; intellectually and morally of a noble strain. The Earl, his father, was a man of earnest piety and active benevolence; a liberal patron of all enterprises of education and religion. The boy who was born to such station, was born also to wealth; a circumstance to be noted as not usual in the case of those who win the kind of honors he did. How rich he was we are not told; but all through his life he seems to have had plenty of money. He used a good deal of it in one way and another. His education in its early stages was conducted after the accustomed manner in noble families. His nurse, half nurse and half governess in his childhood, was, judging by her contribution to the biography, a person of considerable culture. The tutor under whose hand he next passed was a member of the household, and in the discharge of his office accompanied the family on their occasional tours and seasons of residence abroad. At the age of thirteen he was sent to the Old Harrow School in England where he remained four years, till within a few months of his entering Cambridge University in Physically he was a superb specimen of manhood. In his maturity he was six feet three inches in height, but of such symmetry of build that he did not seem so tall; sturdy, alert, very strong, full of animal life and spirit as he could hold, a really magnificent fellow, a strikingly impressive figure seen anywhere. He was one of the foremost athletes of his time, at school and at the University. His exploits on the bicycle especially made him a public character, before he was well through his For some time he held the first place among the amateur bicyclists of Great Britain. He rode a great number of races, and won abundance of prizes; on one occasion, in a long close contest beating the national professional champion. He once rode from Lands End to John OGroats House miles within thirteen consecutive days, an average of over seventy-six miles a day, counting in nearly two days lost by weather. For ten successive years he was elected president of the London Bicycle Club; and all his life was in much request as judge in bicycle tournaments and in like capacities. Fond, however, as he was of athletics, he did not at any time make it other than a strictly subordinate interest. In one of his letters he thus states the view on which he justified himself in that considerable degree of attention he devoted to it. If he says we exercised and trained our bodies more than we do, there would be less illness, bad temper, nervousness, and self-indulgence; more vigor and simplicity of life. Of course, you can have too much of it; but the tendency, in most cases, is to indulge the body, and not exercise it enough; and athletic contests are an excellent means of inducing young people to deny themselves in this respect. In addition to his physical advantages, nature also endowed Keith-Falconer with a generous temper and disposition to match; which were expressed in a genial smile, a brave, breezy, hearty voice, and most winning manners. He was a thoroughly companionable person. The spirit in him was sociable and sympathetic by his make. Though of gentle blood he had a native faculty for getting along side his neighbor whoever he might be. He made great friends, for instance, with that professional bicyclist whom he vanquished, who was a man not at all of his grade. These things in him it is interesting to note, in the light of his origin, but especially of other traits and qualities of his, yet to be remarked, in which his substance as a man consisted. His intellectual gifts were the counterpart of his physical and social. He was not, indeed, a genius. His mind was not of the creative order. But it was in the highest degree acquisitive, sound, robust, tenacious, critical: And through his entire life he is to be seen as a illodern Saint. He was ever one of the hardest working young men in Great Britain, this earls son. The story of his achievements and successes in scholarship is quite too long to rehearse. At Harrow he rose to the head of the school; and at Cambridge his career was brilliant in the extreme. Many prizes as he took as a bicyclist, he took a good many more, in those same years, in academic competitions: Yet in all his letters there is no sign that he was ever ambitious for honors on their own account; but much to suggest that in themselves he little cared for them. He was vastly interested in his work for its own sake. He was an allround man ; good at everything he tried ; and in his accomplishments a sort of Admirable Crichton. To vent his eager and overflowing energy, he was wont to take up outside his regular tasks, now this and now that by-occupation or hobby; and whatever he did in that way he did thoroughly. For example, he became immensely interested in the new Tonic Sol-fa system of musical notation, and so mastered it that about the time he entered the University he was awarded two honorary certificates of proficiency by the principal academy in London where it is taught. He also, while yet a lad became remarkably skilled in phonography, and ultimately an expert on the subject, a recognized expert. The article on Short hand in the last edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica, an exhaustive essay, historical and bibliographical, is from his pen. Hensley, in whose house he lived and with whom he studied mathematics in the interval between his leaving Harrow and his matriculation at Cambridge, he was then seventeen, says of him at that time, that he would rise at seven to take lessons in the Tonic Sol-fa system, or at other times might be heard singing to himself as he lay in bed at the same early hour. In short, he was always doing something. If he had but a quarter of an hour before work time, he would be busy with his short hand, or would spring on his bicycle and dash round the town, and be home again at the appointed hour. There, he felt, lay his best aptitude; and there his taste led him. Already, before taking his degree, he had won examination honors in the first two, and remaining at the University after his graduation, he threw himself with characteristic ardor into work in that field. As an instance of his facility it is related that once having indispensable use for the contents of a book in Dutch, with which neither he nor any one at hand was acquainted, he procured a Dutch grammar and went to work at it and in three weeks could read the book. Before long he was marked by the learned society of the place, which was observant of him as a man of whom the greatest things might be expected. He was appointed by the University an examiner for the Hebrew scholarships, the honors of which he had himself lately carried off; and presently a lecturer or instructor in Hebrew. He taught, as he did everything else, with all his heart and with conspicuous success. He took just as much pains, says one of his associates, in teaching the stupidest man as the cleverest. He assumed a large amount of extra work in the private tutoring of his backward students, receiving, however, the ordinary fee for such service, except in one case; and then he sent the money as a contribution to a hospital, half in his own name and half in the name of the student from whom he received it. Of course, being pecuniarily independent, he could afford this; but it shows his spirit. He was generosity itself. Later still he was offered and accepted the distinguished and ancient chair of Lord Almoners Professor of Arabic in the University of Cambridge, an appointment which was a good deal of the nature of a decoration since the duty involved was confined to the delivery of one or two annual lectures. In the year , at the age of twenty-nine, he published, as what may be called the first-fruits of his scholarship his volume, Kalilak and Dimnali, otherwise known as the Fables of Bidpai, a translation from the Syriac, with an elaborate introduction and copious critical notes, of one of the great Indian classics, a part of the original Buddhist literature and A Modern Saint. Which piece of work all competent judges united in pronouncing an extraordinary performance of its kind, displaying not only prodigious labor, but a marvellous erudition, and a science of the highest order. The German Professor Xodeke, the most eminent authority in the world in that department, closed his review of the book with saying, We will look forward with hope to meet the young Orientalist who has so early stepped forward as a master, many a time yet; and not only in the region of the Syriac. Our earls son is evidently very much of a man in his brains; and has acquitted himself royally. But the Arabic was his fascination. It is appallingly hard, he wrote when he was first getting into it. But he conquered it. When he had used all the help Cambridge could afford him, to perfect himself he went to Leipsic where a more advanced instruction was to be had, and passed months there toiling like a slave. And he did perfect himself, i. But it is classical, literary Arabic that he has acquired; and now nothing will do but that he must know modern colloquial Arabic. So down he goes to Egypt and passes yet other months there though owing to unforeseen circumstances of obstruction finding less opportunity to his desire than he had hoped doing something to put that finish on his accomplishment. It can be nothing less than true to say that in the year , five years after he took his degree, and when he was thirty years of age, there was hardly a young man in Great Britain they were very few at any rate who held a position by virtue of intellectual capacity and achievement, of more shining eminence than did Keith-Falconer; or whose promise for the future, in the ranks of learning, was so bright. But this splendid fellow, it turns out has not yet decided what he will do. He knows what his general purpose in life is; he is going to do something with his acquisitions; but pre At last, how- ever, it is time to answer it. It looks as if scholarship had the best chance, and considerable title, to be made his calling, but he has never committed himself for good and all to that service. And now in order to appreciate the shape in which the mat- ter of his life work is before him, as well as his solution of it, it is necessary to inquire again what kind of a man he is; what his underlying thoughts are; his ideas on the subject of what life is for; his conception of its most eligible uses and rewards. Going, then, back to Harrow, we find that he arrived there at the age of thirteen, a boy, but a big boy, already fixed in principles of Christian uprightness. His manliness in that direction developed early. One of the masters of the school, Mr. Arthur Watson, says of him: He was one of those boys Always high principled and religious, he never disguised his views It was refreshing to meet with one who was by no means disposed to swim necessarily with the stream; and who, though in no wise self-engrossed or unsociable, would not flinch a moment from saying or doing what he believed to be right at the risk of incurring unpopularity, or being charged with eccentricity. Not that he was anything of a prig or a Phari- see; far from it. He was an earnest, simple-hearted, devout Christian boy. A school-fellow of his named Russell, who has since been member of Parliament, and whose testimony is of special value as indicating what the other boys thought of him, having said of him that his moral standard in speech and action was the highest, adds this in particular, which is worthy of special note: He took an earnest, and, as he rose in school, an authoritative, part against those forms of evil communications which are always present in a greater or less degree in every assemblage of boys. What could one wish better for a boy than that he should make it possible for the companions of his school days to bear that witness of him? It may be recalled here, as betokening the interest, and the sort of interest, he retained in his old school, that one of his many benefactions while he was in the University, was the foundation at Harrow of two liberal prizes called, after his A illodern Saint. As the boy was, so was the youth, and so was the man. His Christian character went to Cambridge with him and was there maintained, maintained and deepened. He grew ever more earnestly religious as he grew older. If any man in the Uni- versity was exposed to the temptations that come in the social way, he was, with his rank and his wealth and his good-fellow- ship. But he lived a clean Christian life there, and had a splendid time, and hosts of friends, every one of whom re- spected him wholly. But this is not the complete account of him as a Christian in those years. That same schoolmate Russell says of him at Har- row, that his religion was not self-contained, personal and pas- sive.

I tried to do what is right, but that book is wrong. Being a hero is not about compassion and having forgiveness. Doing whatever it takes to defeat your enemies. Gaston is based on the character of the same name, and is an allusion to the Rose from the Disney film Beauty and the Beast. Gaston is formally polite, but upon noticing Belle is unhappy with the set-up, he apologizes and even offers to leave to ease her discomfort. Hearing a beast nearby, Gaston goes to track it down, and Belle follows, finding him near a pit where a young ogre has fallen in. During this, she tells him about her mother instilling her love for books, and then lends him her favorite one, Her Handsome Hero, a tale of compassion and forgiveness. When he tries to kiss her, she is momentarily fazed before directing his attention to the antiquities book, which states the mirror of souls can prove if a person has evil in his or her heart. In her absence, Gaston tortures the ogre, believing the creature is inherently evil. The ogre attacks him and escapes, and when Belle finds him, he leaves out any mention of how he harmed the ogre. Maurice then deems the ogre dangerous and leaves with Gaston to hunt it down. Once the ogre is cornered, Gaston prepares to shoot it, and Belle stops him by making the arrow pierce the mirror. Belle allows the ogre to leave, but afterwards, news spreads of the ogres breaching the eastern region. With Maurice, Belle and several knights, Gaston stays in the war council room, awaiting a response from Rumplestiltskin. They fear for the worst after hearing loud pounding at the door, but it turns out to be the Dark One. Rumplestiltskin promises to help Maurice if Belle becomes his maid forever. Gaston objects out of worry over her safety, as does Maurice, but Belle consents in order to save the kingdom from the ogres. In his locker, he has the book Belle once gave him, which only reminds him of the choice he made that led to his own death. Despite trying to throw out the book several times, it always returns to him. Hades gives Gaston a chance at revenge by shooting Mr. Gold with arrows that has been dipped in the river of lost souls. In doing so, Gaston can kill his most hated enemy and trap him in the river forever. Outside the pawnshop, Gaston looses an arrow on Mr. Gold, but it misses him. Belle is shocked to see Gaston, who shoots another arrow at Mr. Gold catches it in his hand, noticing what the arrow contains. Before another arrow can hit him, Mr. Gold teleports himself and Belle away. Gold tries to persuade Belle into letting him to use enough dark magic to take care of Gaston, but Belle wants to help Gaston with his unfinished business. She is invested in this because, as Hook told her, when his brother Liam moved on, Hades seemingly became weaker. Hades offers to tear up the baby contract if Belle allows Gaston and Mr. Gold to fight and for one of them to push the other into the river, but she refuses. At the pawnshop, she sets up a dummy of Mr. Gold to see if Gaston will actually kill him. Gaston falls for the trap and becomes upset at the deception, while Belle suggests his unfinished business might be her since he still has the book. He angrily recounts the fatal decision he made prior to his death and how the book is a reminder of that. Gold attempts to throw Gaston into the river, after Belle tells him about the deal Hades offered. Belle seizes the dagger to force him to stop, but then, Gaston tries to shoot Mr. Gold again, only for a panicked Belle to push him into the river.

The Underworld events take place after "Our Decay". As the two take a stroll in the woods they are interrupted by a noise and Gaston senses that it came from large animal. They find a young ogre in a pit trap and Gaston vows that he will bring the creature back to her father. However, Belle believes the ogre does not mean any harm and wants to find another so that does not involve killing it. Gaston agrees to go along with her idea. She wishes to use the mirror on the ogre to see if he means the kingdom any harm. Belle also shows Gaston a book titled "Her Handsome Hero" which she says defines how a hero is supposed to act, with compassion. They nearly kiss, but Belle turns him down. Belle leaves to fetch the mirror and Gaston agrees to watch over the ogre. Later, Belle tells her father about trapped ogre. When they arrive at the pit, Gaston is injured and claims the ogre had escaped and waited to attack him. Gaston suddenly sees the ogre and shoots at the creature with arrow from the tree. Gaston is ready to kill the ogre but Belle argues with him, believing there is a misunderstanding. During the argument Gaston breaks the mirror. That, combined with several fresh wounds on the ogre, reveals that Gaston had tortured the ogre in order to provoke the creature so they would have reason to kill it. Belle lets the ogre escape. Gaston arrives and proposes to Belle, and Belle reluctantly agrees, as she believes it is the only way to save the kingdom. In the Underworld[ edit ] Emma wakes up from a nightmare. Hook sense something is wrong and a tornado appears. The three seek shelter behind a large crypt and Hook senses there is a large creature nearby. Snow attempts to face the creature and is taken away and presumably killed which wakes Emma. Emma tells Hook about the dream wondering if they are visions of the future. Emma and Regina use their magic to open the door as they break the code and the door opens revealing a brick wall, their efforts proving futile. Emma outlines some of the details of the dream believing that she can erase their names from the tombstones to all everyone to leave the underworld. Hades is standing there to see Zelena when he notices a daisy growing in the broken road. Regina decides to talk to Zelena, who knows more about Hades rather than the others. When Regina visits Zelena, she realizes that her and Hades are in love. At the underworld cemetery, Emma attempts to cast the spell from her dream, but suddenly starts believing the nightmare is coming true when the same storm appears. Snow White tells Emma that love is worth it. Meanwhile, Belle issues an ultimatum to Gold, saying that this time she should take charge of things her in order to protect her child. Moments after Hades picked up the flower, which have suddenly started growing in the Underworld because the outsiders have bought hope, enlist Gaston, who was working at Storybrooke Pet Shelter. Hades wanted Gaston to take down everyone, startling with Gold, and handed Gaston a set of lethal arrows, which were forged in the River of Lost Souls Acheron. When Gold and Belle attempt to look up a spell, they leave arguing over his use of Dark Magic, when they are met by an arrow fired by Gaston. Gold catches the next one, even as Belle tries to mediate. Gaston tells Belle that Gold as Rumplestiltskin was responsible for his death, as he aims another arrow, but just as he fires, Gold uses magic to relocat him and Belle to the docks. Belle is shocked to learn about how Gaston died, even as Gold was ready to use Dark Magic to defeat Gaston, but Belle refuses, believing that her goal to help Gaston move on would be solve the conflict and weaken Hades. Let Gaston and Rumple fight to the death. When Gaston arrived to the Pawn Shop, he aims at what he thought was Gold but discovers a mannequin instead. He is then confronted by Belle, who now knows he was willing to kill Rumple and believed he still had feelings for her, only to learn that the book was punishment and a constant reminder of why he died. At the docks, Gold uses magic to choke Gaston by the throat, ready to send him to the River of Lost Souls, when Belle pulls the dagger and commands him not to hurt Gaston, and he drops Gaston on the ground. However, Gaston is unable to let his vendetta against Gold go, and when he goes for his arrow, Belle accidentally knockes Gaston out into the River of Lost Souls. Unfortunately, Belle discovers that because she saved Gold but interfered, Hades arrives to tell the couple that the contract allowing him to take their baby was still in effect, as Belle was the one who knocked Gaston into the Acheron, not Gold. He then looks at a withering daisy flower that he picks up, as a sign of hope fading away. Finally, Emma, Regina, Hook, and Snow chase down the beast in the woods that Emma believes to be the same one from the dream, and uses her magic to stop it. Snow tells Emma that her dream was actually a vision pointing them to Ruby.

Shoto originally had a cold, aloof personality which stemmed from his abusive upbringing. Focused and unemotional, Shoto preferred to keep to himself instead of hanging out with other people. After the events of the U. Sports Festival , however, Shoto has become noticeably more sociable, even gaining a sense of humor and occasionally smiling, although still retaining a distant attitude for the most part. Despite his usual reserved demeanor, Shoto did initially possess a mild level of arrogance, which, combined with his solitary tendencies, sometimes made him take the initiative without considering the opinions of others, as he was confident that he could take on any obstacles with his own strength. He used to be much more unfriendly as well, to the point of causing someone to resent him. Shoto is quite seasoned in battle, being able to stay calm and composed even while fighting real villains. Though brutal in combat, Shoto is well-grounded on the ethics of heroism, only wishing to subdue his frozen opponents as opposed to killing them by prolonging their frozen states. Shoto appears to draw his heroic values from All Might , which is a trait he shares in common with Izuku Midoriya and Katsuki Bakugo. Shoto infuriated with Endeavor. As such, Shoto decided to rely solely on his ice power and never use the other half of his Quirk in battles, going so far as to cover his left torso and arm with ice in his first Hero Costume to symbolize his rebellion against his father. His flames would be used only to undo his freezing moves. During his match with Izuku Midoriya in the U. After the battle, Shoto had mixed feelings about using his left side, but after reconciling with his mother, Shoto eventually came to terms with the half he once hated. Despite being scarred by her when he was a young kid, Shoto showcases no hard feelings towards his mother, visiting her often ever since the end of the Sports Festival. Having been denied a normal childhood so that his father could train him to realize his own selfish ambitions, Shoto still holds various psychological scars, which tend to emerge back into his mind when others compare him to Endeavor. With Endeavor now attempting to improve his relationship with his family, Shoto has taken a cautious, yet hopeful approach to this development. Abilities Shoto effortlessly defeating villains at the U. Shoto has been established as the strongest student in Class 1-A. Even after defeating him in the Sports Festival, Katsuki Bakugo seems to acknowledge that Todoroki should have won the fight had he used his full power. After coming to terms with using his firepower, Shoto was strong enough to hold his ground against the Hero Killer Stain , a powerful villain who had bested various Pro-Heroes. Shoto is fast, agile and has quick reflexes. He was able to keep first place during the majority of the Obstacle Race during the sports festival thanks to his own athletic ability. He was also able to create ice walls within a split second in order to prevent himself from getting thrown out of the ring during his battles with Izuku and Katsuki. Shoto has proven to be very intelligent. He realized the villains attacking had some kind of agenda and interrogated some of them to get answers. This shows he is very skilled in his academics. The appendages on his right side can drastically lower temperatures of anything they touch, enough so to create large waves of ice. The limbs on his left side generate heat and allow Shoto to create and shoot streams of fire. Until taken to his bodily limit, neither has any visible effect on his body.
