Monochromatic painting has been an important component of avant-garde visual art throughout the 20th century and into the 21st century. Painters have created the exploration of one color, the examination of values changing across a surface, the expressivity of texture and nuance, expressing a wide variety of emotions, intentions and meanings in.

Showing posts with label monochromatic self-portraits. I lived in a trailer. I know what the look like, okay? Another day in post-subday paradise. Thankfully, times have changed uh, except for those chicken scratch notes. These days, I leave pre-recorded notes for my sub. And the kids keep on creating! Imagine that, no more "read a book, draw a picture" but fur realz, bonafide lesson plans. And allow the kids to create! And enjoy that "sick" day I have this dream of my students creating several street murals throughout our school and this one they will start without me. This fun lesson was a quickie as I was only out for a pinch. Last winter I had to miss several days of school due to jury duty. By the way, you might be wondering just exactly how I get these videos to my sub. This works if you know you are going to be absent. And just like most grown up stuff, it can take lot of time away from what you enjoy. Creating these sub plans for the kids made the whole experience less painful. Going to the NAEA convention was a thrill for me You can find the blog post here and the finished mural here. Feel free to use these videos and lessons in your art room. Would love to hear your fabulous sub plans, friends!

Not strictly a minimalist, he has made a number of monochrome paintings on shaped canvases and single color rectangular panels. His interest in nature extends so far that he has made a series of plant lithographs in an impressive and sincerely realistic style. Mino Argento, Rome, Italy- monochromes, white on white paintings were variations on the gridded, rectangle on rectangle themes, but were enlivened with differences in rhythm and conception. One composition included grayed grids and vertical rectangles in several, more opaque whites, clustered centrally. Abstract Expressionist brushwork is used as formal material in these minimalist constructions. Ryman exhibits a tour de force of variation on a deliberately limited theme. Later, Stella abandoned not only monochrome, but also eventually geometric painting. "Neutral forms," his meticulously finished, polished monochrome objects are often simply leaned up against gallery walls, in what some critics describe as a casual "West Coast-lean. Museum van Hedendaagse Kunst Antwerp, Belgium Allan McCollum born, Los Angeles, California, USA determined in the mid-60s that the social forces that give paintings meaning may be better understood if the "painting" itself could be reduced to a generic form—a painting that could read as a "sign" for a painting," which could function as a "placeholder," or a kind of "prop. These hundreds of objects that looked like framed, matted, fields of painted blackness, worked as neutral, "generic signs" that might inspire the viewer to think about the social expectations that constructed the "idea" of a painting," more than the actual painting itself. Paradoxically, as time went by, these neutral objects became valuable in themselves, as symbols of an anthropological way of looking at art. Anne Truitt — was an American artist of the mid-20th century; she is associated with both minimalism and Color Field artists like Morris Louis and Kenneth Noland. Primarily thought of as a minimalist sculptor, and as a colorist who painted her sculpture, throughout her career Truitt produced several series of Monochromatic paintings. She made what is considered her most important work in the early 60s anticipating in many respects the work of minimalists like Donald Judd and Ellsworth Kelly. She was unlike the minimalists in some significant ways. She named, for instance, many of her works after places and events that were important to her - a practice suggesting a narrative beyond and yet somehow contained by the sculpture. The sculpture that made her significant to the development of Minimalism were aggressively plain and painted structures, often large. The recessional platform under her sculpture raised them just enough off the ground that they appeared to float on a thin line of shadow. The boundary between sculpture and ground, between gravity and verticality, was made illusory. This formal ambivalence is mirrored by her insistence that color itself, contained a psychological vibration which when purified, as it is on a work of art, isolates the event it refers to as a thing rather than a feeling. The event becomes a work of art, a visual sensation delivered by color. Lucio Fontana From on Fontana started the so-called Spatial Concept or slash series, consisting in holes or slashes on the surface of monochrome paintings, drawing a sign of what he named "an art for the Space Age" Concetto spaziale B. Peintures in November Parodying a traditional catalogue, the book featured a series of intense monochromes linked to various cities he had lived in during the previous years. Peintures anticipated his first two shows of oil paintings, at the Club des Solitaires, Paris, October and Yves: Proposition monochromes at Gallery Colette Allendy, February These shows, displaying orange, yellow, red, pink and blue monochromes, deeply disappointed Klein, as people went from painting to painting, linking them together as a sort of mosaic. Shocked at this misunderstanding, Klein knew a further and decisive step in the direction of monochrome art would have to be taken From that time onwards he would concentrate on one single, primary color alone: Discovered with the help of Edouard Adam, a Parisian paint dealer, the effect was to retain the brilliance of the pigment which tended to become dull when suspended in linseed oil. Klein later patented this recipe to maintain the "authenticity of the pure idea. The Parisian exhibition, at the Iris Clert Gallery, May, became a seminal happening; [21] As well as blue balloons being released to mark the opening, blue postcards were sent out using IKB stamps that Klein had bribed the postal service to accept as legitimate. Gerhard Richter born,

Dresden, Germany is an artist who is probably best known for his technically stunning photo-realist paintings, which overshadow his abstract and monochrome works. Both his abstract and representational works seem to cover similar emotional terrain, a kind of ironic pessimism which made his work very fashionable in the late s. Later, in New York in the late s, Mosset undertook a long series of monochrome paintings, during the heyday of Neo-expressionism.
