Jack would later change his surname to a simplified form of the original family name and, using that name, Jack Tworokov , would establish himself as a highly regarded painter of the New York School. At an early age she decided to become a professional artist and, during her high school years, she and friends got together for informal sketching sessions. Dickinson recognized that color relationships are more important to the artist than single colors in isolation. As he did, she painted figuratively but she believed color harmonies to be more important than accurate representation of a subject. Their compositions tended toward bold, simplified shapes and were more reductively abstract and spatially flat than those of many of their contemporaries. Madeline Shiff, Virginia Parker, and E. Soon after the close of the G. She adopted the new name on advice from her friend and fellow Provincetown painter, William Zorach , in order to avoid confusion with her brother Jack. There, on May 1, she met the author, Ford Madox Ford. In contrast, he continued to write prolifically but his best work was behind him and his health was declining. The two of them endured dire financial straits, often raising their own vegetables in a kitchen garden attached to the villa they rented near Toulon. Biala made portraits of Ford and contributed artwork to his books. Ford incorporated versions of Biala in his writings, including a poem, "Coda," a late addition to the "buckshee" sequence of poems composed in In this exhibition of Provincetown artists she was identified, anachronistically, as "J. Reporting on this show, a New York critic said "The things and figures in her painting gravely turn about as if in some slow and harmonious joy. Not a hilarious joy nor a country dance. Something much richer and more contemplative than hilarity. From Minstrels to the Machine. From both men she absorbed a passion for eliminating unnecessary detail. They all exist in harmonious common relationships. She said "The very first spot of paint you put on your canvas sets the note for everything that must follow. Just as in writing a novel Because red is not red itself, its full quality of redness only becomes apparent when it has green beside it or the full quality of green is brought out only when it has purple beside it and so forth. Then against the color you play your forms, lines, and texture. Ford died at Deauville, France, in and Biala became his literary executrix. In she married a fellow artist, Daniel Brustlein , an illustrator who, using the pen name "Alain," made covers for the New Yorker magazine. She remained close to her brother Jack and, in consequence, became one of the few female artists associated with the New York School. As one critic put it, "she continued to paint exquisitely crafted canvases in a personal style that, even now, resists classification. In the s she was given frequent solo exhibitions at the Kouros Gallery and after at the Tibor de Nagy Gallery, both in New York. In , after six decades of painting, the quality of her work was as good as ever. He wrote, "The Structure of her pictures often looks quite simple, The difficulty and complexity have been refined into lean, direct gestures and a lyrical, concentrated economy of form. In her interiors, cityscapes, landscapes and portraits, some colors and shapes hover and run; others asset themselves suddenly and then stay put, fixing space in a way that is reminiscent of Bonnard and Hofmann. Suffusing them is the outlook of a painter who has found what she needs and knows what she wants to do. The results glow with a wondrous candor. The exception is the Biala web site which gives September 11 but does not indicate the source of this information. He was the son of Benjamin Tworokovsky and his wife Celia. Although Biala and Jack changed their names from Bernstein to Tworokov when they became adults, Hyman and Esther retained the name Bernstein. Her birth name in Hebrew was Schenehaia Tworokovska. After immigration this became Janice Bernstein. As a young adult she became Janice Tworokov as mentioned. During the s she painted under this name or J. She did not use the names Mrs. Janice Gatch or Mrs. Lee Gatch, and was infrequently called by either name. In , at the suggestion of fellow painter, William Zorach, she chose a new name so as to avoid confusion with her brother, the other J. She chose Biala, the name of her birthplace. Ford though they were not married or Janice Ford Biala. After her marriage in to Daniel Brustlein, she retained Biala as her name but was occasionally called Mrs. At least on one occasion she used his professional name, calling herself Janice "Alain" Biala. She worked odd jobs in the s and her life with Ford Madox Ford was hand-to-mouth. After marrying Brustlein, however, his success in selling drawings to the New Yorker for which he frequently produced cover art and her growing reputation as a painter brought in a gradually increasing funds and by they were able to buy a small farmhouse in Peapack, New Jersey, for their use on their return to the United States from their residence in Paris. And when I came to France I felt as if I had come home. I smelled the same smells of bread baking and dogs going around in a very busy way, you know, as if they knew what they were about. It really was extraordinarily human. Studio, New York Group show at the G.
