D70 from Nikon. Skip to Main Previously referred to as Digital Vari-Program in the Manual. Exposure Compensation $\hat{A}\pm 5$ EV in increments of 1/3, 1/2 or 1 EV.

Both of these cameras have an incredibly fast flash synch speed. The flash synch speed is the maximum shutter speed that your camera can use when the flash is activated. This is a fantastic feature for portrait photographers who work in variable light conditions. Compared to the D50 The D70s differs from the D50 in several key ways that make it more suitable for the advanced amateur portrait photographer. First, the camera is easier to control manually, since it features two dials: When you set the camera to manual exposure mode, one dial changes the aperture of the lens and the other changes the shutter speed of the camera. This feature sets the lens to the aperture that you have selected, so you can see a preview in the viewfinder before you take the shot. Aperture affects depth of field: Viewfinder Grid One advantage that the D70s has over its competition not just the D50 is the ability to display a grid in the viewfinder. But first, some clarification. When you look through the viewfinder of most digital SLR cameras, the only thing that you see are the focus points. These appear as small squares or rectangles within the field of view. In addition to the focus points, the Nikon D70s also displays four grid lines, 2 horizontal and 2 vertical. Depending on the types of photos you take, these lines can be extremely helpful. A common problem with most photographers is getting horizon lines level. You look through the viewfinder, get everything lined up and take the picture. When you get home and look at the photo on your computer, that horizon line is clearly at an angle. I found that the grid lines help to eliminate this problem - when you can line up the horizon with a line in the viewfinder, your chances of making it slanted are significantly reduced. The second benefit is that the lines help you with your composition. A common composition technique is called the rule of thirds, where you divide the frame into thirds and place important subjects off-center. Since the grid lines in the Nikon D70s viewfinder are arranged in a rule-of-thirds pattern, this makes it easier for beginning photographers to learn this important photographic technique. As I was putting the camera through its paces for this D70s guide, I spent a lot of time trying to capture spontaneous moments. The D70s can take continuous photos a 3 photos per second, and can capture 12 consecutive shots before it starts to slow down. Compare this to the higher-end Canon 30D or Nikon D, and you can see the difference:
