I was barely out of college. My journalism degree helped me land a part-time office job with the publisher of a Texas restaurant guide. The hours were flexible, and I could continue my prayer time schedule of 8 a. Mass, then prayer until 9. The publication folded in less than a year. Then came the God-incidence. I worked as a volunteer one weekend in the pressroom of a large Catholic conference. The manager of the pressroom was the editor of the diocesan newspaper. He was looking for a copyeditor. The job would bring some opportunities to write stories, interview people and get published with a byline. After a short interview in his office the next week, he hired me. First day of my dream job On my first morning of this exciting dream job, I got up early to iron an outfit I determined would make a good first impression on the staff. But the iron was too hot and scorched the blouse. Later, I was thankful because that definitely was not the right outfit. I scurried around getting dressed in a more casual suit and took off for the Chancery office across town. The stoplight a mile into my new journey was red " for a long time. As I waited for my turn, a praying mantis landed on my windshield wiper. Prayer time messenger Then I checked my watch. Okay, Lord, you sent me a silent messenger to remind me that I need to get my prayer time with you back on my schedule. Prompted by the praying mantis, I soon found the chapel at the Chancery, making it my quiet place for prayer. If we are unfaithful he remains faithful, for he cannot deny himself.

Excerpt from correspondence regarding a homosexual character in Mantis Prayers: If, as writers, we restrict ourselves to the prose version of the missionary position, we limit our ability to grow, and, in turn, force our readers into the same familiar corner with each story. Yes, I had some concern writing about this, as I have never walked that walk. Nor have I stalked the killer of a loved one, trafficked in black market meat, taught English at the college level, etc. I was aided by a friendship with a gay poet--one who is not too shy in sharing some history of his intimacies. In the end, I imagined a caring, loving individual, different from some of the other characters in the book only in terms of mechanics. This is, I believe, the primary non-political message of the "Gay Rights Movement. After the MWG has their crack at this submission, I plan to pass the revised version on to one or more gay readers, two of which, fortunately, have a literary background. With luck, that secondary review will address the sound footing issue that you correctly question. With the book half-finished, I concluded that I needed three tiers of viewpoints to illustrate the depth and breadth of the malaise. The big exception, of course, is the murder which he is just beginning to understand is the most hideous aspect of the overall problem. Michael and Linda have a more middle class perspective, and more intimate knowledge of the truth and its consequences. Their daughter and her boyfriend experience it in similar ways, but lack the sophistication that experience brings to help them understand it. What was needed, as David expressed most often and most precisely, was to bring the background context into clearer focus. The characters in place were too busy with their lives to see more of this background, although it does tend to infiltrate their conversations more frequently. Expanded news reports would be, of necessity, too cold and brief to be effective. So I added my Guardsman, who, though perhaps naive, has repeated opportunities to see the belly of the beast and react to it in sometimes surprising ways. As you will learn when properly introduced in Feb, Paul brings his own style of luggage to the story, a fact that will help make that strand a little more compelling, I hope. But I think I can pull it off. For all of them, I am continually thankful. Even when I am inspired to do so, the actual blog may not materialize for weeks. You seemed very quietâ€¦yesterday, Thanks for your concern, but all is well. I have two real-life people in mind for Michael and Linda; indeed, some things "Michael" did inspired me to write the story in the first place. The real Linda loves "Michael" for reasons she has tried to explain, but which I honestly do not completely understand. Despite how much I respect her feelings, my lack of understanding comes through too clearly in Mantis. You seem genuinely interested and your characters go a little deeper. You asked for a female perspective and that is what I try to give to you. Her choice would be significant in itself - does she consider herself primarily the mother or the wife? Her relationship with her husband reflects on her not just as a woman, but as a person. He was the man I chose and I must keep up appearances. Sorry, speaking as a citizen of a galaxy far, far away, human interactions interest me like some wildlife documentary if I can just observe them and not have to participate. Mantis Prayers appears to be a thriller set in the near-future, so your requirements for the story do not need to go too deeply but more power to you for probing this deeply. I have a friend â€¦ whose husband turned into a raving psycho - tried to smash her new rental with his own car with their kids sitting in the back of his. Not an easy fix. The moral twist that totally delighted me was that one character serves his time for various reasons, and impersonates a dutiful and law abiding Catholic husband and father. I noted you were reading Lord Jim. I loved Nostromo a couple of years ago - the trouble with English literature for 17 and 18 year olds is that they are not mature enough to engage with the issues. A very interesting exchange, and I do appreciate your perspective. Even so, as "Linda" wrote me after the big incident, "[It] was meant to hurt and it did. I honestly told him that I did not want a divorce, that the prospects of a life without him were really boring and sad But while we may not have been writing blogs, we have been writing the novel. While a somber tale, it is not grim. Teenagers add their youthful optimism, even if it brings along carelessness. There is also enough love present, both for those in relationships and the one who mourns the loss of one. However, the backdrop is important, too. Just as the protagonists need to make decisions about their lives, the political decisions made "off camera" have their impact as well. As one who is concerned about the course of this great nation, both dimensions of the novel are important, and I hope the novel is instructive for making both sound personal and political decisions. In the aftermath of the presidential election just three days ago, I regret to say that the only good news for me from the election is that the publication of Mantis Prayers might just coincide with the bursting of the Obama bubble--if I can write fast enough. During that time, completion of The Boarder on Monroe Street was a first priority. Fortunately, the two tasks are extremely different in nature and require different temperments and time allotments. Writing the new story can be done in spurts and is most fruitful when the part of the personality that encompasses creativity is dominant. At these times, it actually takes a great deal of effort to belay the writing of the story. Such work requires a setting aside of sufficient time and a dedication to accomplishment that, for this writer at least, are often hard to come by. Nevertheless, we are targeting the end of the year as publishing date for The Boarder on Monroe Street.
