She was a trailblazer and "humble pioneer," according to those who knew her. But it was also a life marked by personal tragedy. Her brother committed suicide three years ago around this time of year, two law enforcement sources told CNN on Thursday. Abdus-Salaam, 65, had also been stressed recently at work, the sources said. Her body was found Wednesday afternoon in the Hudson River. Detectives did not find a suicide note. Read More "It is humbling. Someone who got so far and was lost so soon. The judge was last heard from about 9 a. Tuesday, according to the sources. Police responded to a call about a person floating in the Hudson around 1: They found an unconscious and unresponsive woman, who was later pronounced dead and identified as Abdus-Salaam. She was fully clothed in running attire, a black hooded sweatshirt, sweatpants and sneakers. The medical examiner will determine the cause of death, police said. Andrew Cuomo, who appointed her to the court, hailed her as a "trailblazing jurist whose life in public service was in pursuit of a more fair and more just New York for all. On behalf of all New Yorkers, I extend my deepest sympathies. New York Mayor Bill de Blasio tweeted: My thoughts are with her family. She was a humble pioneer. May Allah bless your soul our Sister. She became interested in pursuing law after civil rights attorney Frankie Muse Freeman visited her high school. She began her legal career at the East Brooklyn Legal Services and later became an assistant attorney general in the New York State Department of Law for its civil rights and real estate financing bureaus. She began her judicial career in and was appointed in by then-Gov. On Tuesday, the judge was to be the featured speaker at the annual alumni of color gathering, Lester wrote on the law school website. The event will be postponed "in light of this terrible loss. And when the now famous Captain Sully safely landed the plane, Ric was given a new lease on life, and also a new perspective on it. The days between Thanksgiving and the New Year are always a time for reflection: When my life draws to a close, will I look back with regret? What will I wish I had done? What will matter most? And this is a theme that many TED speakers have explored What can we learn from near-death choices? Artists and athletes, gamers and monks have all tackled this question from different angles TED Fellow Candy Chang creates public art installations that explore the hidden landscape of near-death choices. Her work asks the audience, chalkboard-style, to fill in the blanks: Former Olympian Janine Shepherd had to rethink her answer to that question when a crippling accident ended her cycling career. Instead of crumbling, she found new ones I wish I had stayed in touch with my friends. I wish I had let myself be happier. But sometimes, when people are faced with a deeply traumatic experience -- illness, accident, or another brush with death -- they walk away not diminished, but super-charged by the experience. Suddenly, they can live a life without fear, focused on what matters most to them. And the only appropriate response is gratefulness. We would love to hear your thoughts not only on what matters most to you, but how your perspective on death informs the way you live. Ideas are not set in stone. When exposed to thoughtful people, they morph and adapt into their most potent form.
