Tumbling Paint Box May 23, This quilt was born out of a panicked need to get rid of evidence. Either that, or it was my way of justifying my actions and purifying myself from my transgression. What happened was I broke a rule I had made. You know the one. So much that you are completely out of places to store it. The amount of amazing fabric out there and the inspiration that comes along with just walking down rows and rows of beautiful bolts gets the best of us all from time to time. I really didâ€¦Sort of. This line is a gorgeous range of cross weaves with a soft hand that not only has fabulous color, but also the texture I crave. Textural variety in my quilts is something of a priority for me. I rarely make a quilt out of only one single substrate. I cannot resist them. Especially when they come in pretty bundles. Essentially, that is what designing always feels like to me. In fact, I strongly believe that given enough time and thought it is possible to make any design idea work. Setting design rules right off of the bat is always part of my process. It helps me focus. Too many possibilities and I get overwhelmed. So long story short. I made the rule. The moment the bundle arrived in the mail I felt it needed to be purged from the stash to rectify and absolve my wrongdoing. I went to work trying to figure out a way to use the entire bundle up and be forgiven my sin. I sat down to my computer with determination to puzzle it out. These were the parameters: You must use all 21 colors in a single design. You must use it all, or have only some scraps leftover. Awhile back I had seen a block similar to this as a method of using up small scraps only there was no rhyme or reason to the placement of fabric. When I saw it again in my search for ideas I became curious how the block would look if instead of scraps, specific colors were laid out in a pattern. So that was where I started, With the above parameters and block idea. I could not have been more pleased with the results. Another goal of mine throughout the making of this quilt was for the cutting and piecing process to be as efficient as possible. Also, since all blocks are essentially the same you do not need to lay out all the blocks to arrange them, or use a design wall. Despite its size and amount of fabric pieces this quilt top is actually a very fast make. I was so happy with how this quilt turned out that I decided this needed to be the first official pattern released from the Ginger Peach Studio. Stay tuned for more info as release date approaches. Printed patterns are available now. I guess some rules are made to be broken. I suppose it all worked out because imagine my surprise and delight when Cloud9 contacted me and asked if they could display the Tumbling Paint Box in their booth at Spring Quilt Market. This was the first time any of my quilts had ever been on display for the public. I was both flattered and proud. I am so excited to share this quilt pattern with you and see all of the magical color combinations the crafting community comes up with.
