He states flatly in a story that features his theories on change and innovation, that we are blind to innovation. In the midst of our current business cycles we are grasping for change but fail to see it and capture it. To read that story in Fast company magazine click on blind to innovation story. Not many organizations or business leaders can see that far into the future. But when one thinks about it, certain changes had to occur. Maybe hindsight is twenty-twenty but after pagers, the modern cell phone was inevitable. And as things became even more mobile, the computer too had to become smaller and portable. He taught that it is critical to overcome the fear of change and embrace it to survive. The idea that strategies from the past will work in the future is patently false and companies and individuals need to avoid this thinking; it keeps them from innovation and creativity and makes them stagnant. Joel uses the examples of the Swiss watch industry and the electronics industry in Japan to make his point in the business of paradigms. Watch manufacturing is an industry dominated by the Japanese in the s, 80s and 90s even to a great extent today. But how did that happen? As late as the s, the Swiss completely controlled the watch industry. They were a giant. And yet, by the late s they had lost almost everything. What happened in that one decade to change everything? The Swiss actually invented the electronic Quartz watch and yet it was dismissed by the executives of the watch manufacturers as impractical and inaccurate. The Japanese, however, saw they opportunity and embraced this new paradigm and the rest is history. They have been dominate ever since. The Japanese continued their ability to see future trends. At one point, their goods were considered cheap and poorly produced. They sought to change this reputation with the works of Dr. Edwards Deming and Six Sigma. They quickly changed their reputation and became known throughout the world as a supplier of quality products. The rest of the world took years to catch up. Joel Barker videos have been translated into 16 languages and seen by million people worldwide. Their influence on business and innovation cannot be overstated. His work has mainly focused around paradigm shifts and how businesses need to be constantly aware of how their industry is changing so that they can recognize changes and not be left behind when business paradigms change. He believes the future is something that you form and not something that simply happens to you.
