May 11, Jeanette rated it really liked it 4. I wanted to give it a 5 but thought that I would be vilified as it contains so many words that are no longer used. I am the biggest Jane Gardam fan. Would I love to meet her. A silly bucket wish list would be having dinner with her or a pub crawl. If we were both still actively crawling. This novel is short stories, which I usually like least. I do not think I ever gave short stories a 5 star. This would be 4. This would be one if we were not in the regime of PC police. Not because of the intimidation to current opinion factor, but because of the aspect that it dates a few of the stories. Her human insight and locale feel for Jamaica! No words too superlative. All the stories have intertwining characters around the Pineapple Bay Hotel 5 plus star during the Winter Season. People mainly Britain getting away from cold or closed season climates to Jamaica. We have multiple ages here, as well. The youngest is about 7 or 8 and the oldest is past old. One an ancient Jamaican beach sweeper. Oh, yes, JUST pages. And she says more in that length than two of the last page tomes that I have abandoned for "later". But in this one, I am going to read the first couple of stories again so I understand some of the implications of the last. Her sentence placements, word order in dialog and other present tense flow of ideas! Well, I think they are just about the best and most unique I have ever read. Not bloated and not over-rich with wordy entanglement. And especially in her location descriptions -they just give 7 motes of feeling per syllable. Jane is nearly at her best here. Her crux of human nature, age, self-identity of her characters, absolutely masterful.
