Posted by MPM Leave a Comment It took five years for Carl Page to find a permanent home for his business, a primitive building in an old lumber yard on a dusty, two-lane road along the route to a couple of small, quiet beach towns. But not for long. My family and I are trying to decide our next move. Carl Page was an electrical contractor who traveled the country working at various military installations until he discovered Mount Pleasant. Linda, one of his three children, was just 6 weeks old when her parents chose to put down roots in the sleepy little town of barely more than 5, people. It was dubbed the Thieves Market from the beginning, though it was half a decade before the fledgling business moved to its permanent location. It started out in a metal shed on Schirmer Street, then moved to the spot on Coleman Boulevard that would later be the home of Boulevard Diner. After that building burned to the ground, the Thieves Market set up shop in two more places on Coleman before moving to Ben Sawyer, where it remained for 54 years. He would return to Mount Pleasant with his truck packed to the brim and his friends and neighbors wondering what he would be selling at the Thieves Market. Today, she said, most of her pickers are retired or have passed away. Now she picks up items at estate sales and auctions throughout South Carolina, and she also buys and sells online. A popular bar, Whiskers, was upstairs. Basic municipal services have never been available to customers, employees or owners of the Thieves Market. Just about everything inside the Thieves Market is for sale, though there is one area of the building reserved for items that have special meaning for the Page family and for Mount Pleasant. Perched on a large ledge for all to see are: Overseeing it all is a large statue of Bacchus, the Roman god of wine and revelry. Page was bitten by the entrepreneurial bug long before her parents passed away in , and she and her brother Mike took over the Thieves Market. At the age of 12, she decided that raising rabbits might be fun and profitable. She bought two of the furry mammals and soon had many more, so she ran an ad in the local newspaper broadcasting that she had rabbits of all shapes, sizes and colors for sale. Another time, she acquired 10, apothecary bottle tops. A year later, she had only around left. She also is in the habit of buying box springs, which her daughter cuts apart into individual springs. Page said a man in Wisconsin bought some, then called her back and ordered more. Curious, she asked what he was going to do with them. Is politics a fun business as well? My heart will tell me when the time is right.
