When truly great people depart this earth, I am inclined to be selfish and mourn not just the glories of the past but the glories that will never be: I will never hear a brand new Frank Sinatra album, never see a new Jerome Robbins dance. Many of those guests became his friends, so that, for example, on the day after the London Tube bombings, he called up the mystery novelist and author of The Children of Men P D James and sought out her views, which were characteristically insightful. As Milt told his guest, "I live in continued borrowed radiance from the pleasure of your company" a very Miltonian formulation, but you can hear that Lady James feels the same about him, as did many of those he interviewed. It certainly was that, but, while there may be the rare Chicagoan who refers to it by that title, I never heard anyone in my trade call it anything other than "the Milt Rosenberg show", which it was. It depended on his very particular set of skills. But he was better prepared, more curious and with a wider range of interests, and it quickly became his show, and stayed it. And, as his show went out late in the evening, it ensured that the author at least returned to his hotel room with a warm glow, and the grimmer hits of mid-morning long forgotten. I remember one launch day a decade or so back. It had started to rain, and immediately the yellow cabs had dried up, as they always do. And, with the clock ticking on, my publicist Kathleen eventually hailed one of those bicycling rickshaws that take romantically inclined tourists for moonlit rides round the safe bits of Central Park. So he protested most vigorously all the way, and kept trying to turn back and take us to the Plaza for cocktails, and it all took longer than expected and we arrived at CBS with moments to spare. And Milt began, as he often did, with a classical quotation, whose author he invited me to identify, and I was punchy and frazzled and a little out of breath and struggling to recall. And then I thought, "Hang on, this is the Milt Rosenberg show. I think many of us would have happily done the program even if it only had three listeners. The Internet brought him even more devoted listeners from every corner of the world. Listening to the Steyn interview has also made me an instant fan of the Extension podcast. The host Milton Rosenberg covers a whole range of topics from science to politics to history to sports to music. Over the past week, I have listened to his programs about the French Revolution, the early history of baseball, Humphrey Bogart, the Eichmann trial, Quantum Physics, and Louis Armstrong. That was a very typical week. Milt was a professor of psychology by training, but a self-taught polymath who considered almost every subject worthy of exploration other than, in his words, "pop psychology and poodle-primping". The range of talk on talk radio can be very narrowly drawn, but Milt was like the best of the chaps on the old BBC wireless before they wrecked it: I was a fortunate beneficiary of that: They were for him part of the same story - the long lives of seemingly peripheral individuals are close-ups on the big canvas. A lot of old-timers do that. But what struck me was the way he connected the closure of this or that restaurant or clothes store to some larger social trend or geopolitical phenomenon. Most people live in the assumptions of the present: Milt seemed always to sense under his feet the continuous shifts and surges of the currents of history. So it was great to be able to sit across the table from him not only in the studio but also at dinner afterwards with his wife Marjorie. With Milt, I got the sense it took a little longer: He migrated rightward in his sixties, and further so in his seventies. It caused some grief among certain old friends of his in the Chicago media, precisely because it was hard to damn the most courtly and civilized inquisitor in radio as a "shock jock" although off-air he was rather interested in the comings and goings of Michael Savage et al. Sometimes across the studio table, during commercial breaks, he would sigh over the latest bumpy descent in his tanking Tribune stock. Even by the standards of flailing media companies, they were remarkably badly run. The geniuses who ran the joint figured that lower ratings would be worth it for a cheaper host and no producer. So Milton J Rosenberg was retired "by mutual agreement". So Milt decided to carry on, as a podcast. He relaunched his program as what it had always been: And I was very touched to be invited to be his very first guest. You can hear that show by clicking the button at the top of the page. A station in, I think, Evanston then picked it up, and on one memorable occasion two years ago Milt hosted both me and the aforementioned

Conrad Black. You can hear that show in its entirety here. I believe that was my penultimate appearance with him: Tweedsmuir and Trump on one broadcast: We send our condolences to Marjorie and their son and grandchildren. I shall miss his curiosity - about distant lands, and remote history, and complex technology, and all the other difficult topics he made so easy for listeners. He was the best at that. Feb 04, Cheryl rated it really liked it Book Review: A journey it is. This book is not a step-by-step list of things to do nor is this book a deep theological work, but a journey of sorts. Not traveling from one place to another, but more about who you are traveling with, in this case, God. I found this book to be a very enjoyable read. Glimpses of his real humanity shone through. I appreciate his honesty. This much authenticity is rare to find and this case, funny, too. Given the importance and gravity of the topic he balanced it well with stories and more than a dollop of pleasant humor. While reading, at some points, worship songs came to my mind. I think he must have been truly drawing me into His company. Overall I found this book to be extremely encouraging and not the least bit condemning nor judgmental. So each chapter felt like a gentle loving nudge from the Holy Spirit towards the Father. If you would like to experience these invitations for yourself purchase your own copy of this book now. Disclosure of Material Connection: I received this book free from Bethany House Publishers as part of their blogging for books program. I was not required to write a positive review. The opinions I have expressed are my own. I feel this book helped me draw closer to my Father after realizing more how He wants us to spend time with Him; quiet, uninterrupted time with Him. My mind cannot wrap around the King of the Universe wanting a relationship with me. It gives God pleasure to spend time with His children. Any father should desire to spend time with their children and God is no different. There are 30 chapters with a wonderful prayer at the end of each. The prayers are taken from Scripture. Many of the chapters strongly spoke to me and it was exactly what I needed at the time. I love when that happens! Sheets brought many of them to life. I especially loved the word studies he included. It helped make sense of many of the verses and stories taken from the Bible. Chapter 20, The Lingerers, was my favorite and it stirred something in me. The author mentions allowing only certain people into his heart. God is like that too. God will allow many in His presence but more selective with His heart. Sheets writes with humor, shares life lessons and tells Bible stories in way you can relate to your life. Many of the chapters have changed my life, if not the entire book. I received a complimentary copy of this book from Bethany House in exchange for my review.
