Prehistoric Britain Prehistoric hunters used flint tools for hunting and butchering horses. The earliest horse remains found in the area now covered by Britain and Ireland date to the Middle Pleistocene. Dependent on the rise and fall of sea levels associated with advancing and retreating Ice ages , this allowed humans and fauna to migrate between these areas; as the climate fluctuated, hunters could follow their prey, including equids. Horse remains dating from the Mesolithic period, or Middle Stone Age, early in the Holocene, have been found in Britain, though much of Mesolithic Britain now lies under the North Sea , the Irish Sea and the English Channel , and material which may include archaeological evidence for the presence of the horse in Britain continues to be washed into the sea, by rivers and coastal erosion. Coles named this low-lying area " Doggerland ", in which the River Thames flowed somewhat to the north of its current route, joining the Rhine to flow west to the Atlantic Ocean along the line of what is now the English Channel. It may have been the richest hunting, fowling and fishing ground available to the people of Mesolithic Europe. Exceptions are the Ferrybridge and Newbridge chariots, which are the only ones found to have been buried intact. These horses had been butchered for horsemeat ; but a revival of the cult of the Celtic goddess Epona , protector of horses, donkeys and mules, may account for horse carcasses buried whole at Dunstable, with "special care". These distinguish between cart horses two words , pack horses two words , riding horses three words , horses for breeding three words, male and female , horses suitable for royalty and aristocracy five words, of which three were mainly used in poetry , and warhorses one word. Harold of England had then been "strong in cavalry". Bayeux Tapestry [This] was a tactical decision Horses in warfare , British Agricultural Revolution , and Horses in the Middle Ages The improvement of horses for various purposes began in earnest during the Middle Ages. King Alexander I of Scotland c. And when they were light off their horses, they let their horses go whither they would, and they that could catch them had them to their own behoof. And when they were alight off their horses they let them go wherever they would, and they that could take them had them still at their liking. He was a passionate supporter of hunting, the tournament, and horse racing , in which Spanish horses known as "running horses" were then primarily involved. Both tenant farmers and landlords were involved in the harrowing of land for arable crops in the relatively new open field system , and employed horses for this work. Horses and carts were increasingly used for transporting farm goods and implements; peasants were obliged to transport such items in their own carts, though the poorest may have had to rely on one horse for all their farm work. The necessity for carting produce revolutionised communication between villages. Where loads were suitable, and the ground was exceptionally poor, pack horses had an advantage over wagons as they needed fewer handlers, were faster, and could travel over much rougher ground. In , while in Scotland, King Edward IV established a temporary relay of riders between London and Berwick-upon-Tweed , which allowed messages to be transmitted within two days, and appears to have imitated a system used by Louis XI of France. While the horse collar , which allows a horse greater freedom to pull heavy loads, had been used in western Europe by the 10th century, and may be shown in the Bayeux Tapestry of the 11th or 12th century, [76] the use of horse teams in Britain was made possible in part because of an increase in the farming of oats , a staple food for hard-working horses. Annual round-ups on common land were enforced, and any stallion under the height limit was ordered to be destroyed, along with "all unlikely [small horses] whether mares or foals". Laws calling for swingeing culls of "under-height" horses were partially repealed by Elizabeth I in Areas of poor quality land could not support the weight of horses desired by Henry VIII, and were exempted because of "their rottenness Horse transport was so extensive at the time that on one morning alone 2, horses were counted on the road between Shoreditch , just north of the city of London, and Enfield , about Travel became more popular, along with the hiring of horses, although a common practice at the time was for a traveller to buy a horse for a journey, and then sell it on arrival at his destination. Gervase Markham, When Gervase Markham published his Cavalarice, or the English Horseman in 1589, farmers were not only using pack horses, farm horses and cart horses, but were also breeding horses for saddling and driving. Markham recommended crossing native horses with other breeds for particular purposes, for example suggesting Turks or Irish Hobbies as an outcross to produce riding animals, Friesland and Flanders horses to produce light driving animals, and German heavy draught horses to produce heavy haulage animals. These horses became known as Lincolnshire Blacks, [87] and the English heavy draught horses of today are their descendants. This led to complaints, as there was still a need for stronger, more powerful types of horse. The English Civil War, from 1642 to 1651, disrupted horse racing; Oliver Cromwell banned horse racing and ordered that all race horses and spectators at such an event should be seized. He concentrated on the breeding of animals suited as cavalry horses, by encouraging crossbreeding of lightweight racing horses with the heavier working horses, and effectively produced a new type of horse altogether in the warmblood. It was not until that legislation removed the restrictions on horses for export. By 1700, a lighter plough which could be drawn by two horses, the "Dutch plough", was used in eastern England; [citation needed] this was followed in by the lightweight Rotherham plough, an unwheeled, or "swing" plough. It was advertised as reducing ploughing times by a third, or using a third less horsepower for the same ploughing time. The improved seed drill and horse-hoe were invented by Jethro Tull in 1701; but it took more than 50 years for these designs to come into common use. Travelling between London and Oxford by coach had involved an overnight stay at Beaconsfield, but Oxford University organised a project to allow completion of the journey between sunrise and sunset. The horses required for fast coaches were mainly produced by outcrossing heavy farm mares to the lighter racing type of horse, as a combination of speed, agility, endurance and strength was required. While the aristocracy and gentry paid high prices for matched teams of quality horses, farmers sold the best of their animals at a good profit, keeping lower-quality animals for themselves, or for sale as saddle horses. However, proprietors of coaching inns accounted for most of the trade. In many cases a proprietor would work his horse teams only in his local district, but some owned many coaching establishments, and could provide transport over much greater distances. An advantage to proprietors of a string of coaching inns was that passengers on their coaches also used and paid for the services offered by their inns, often including overnight accommodation. Some inn proprietors owned hundreds of horses. The Middleton Railway had been established for industrial use by an Act of Parliament in 1725; Parliament also allowed the construction of the Surrey Iron Railway, intended to carry goods, in 1790, and the Oystermouth Railway, later known as the Swansea and Mumbles Railway, in 1796. These initially used horse-drawn vehicles, [98] but developments in steam engines made them cheaper to run than horses, and more useful as a source of locomotive power on railways. By 1825, numerous railway lines had been laid, forming networks such as that created by George Hudson; [] the number of rail miles expanded from 1, in 1825, to 6, by 1830, and horse-drawn passenger coaches became virtually obsolete over long distances. One man could invest in a portable machine, and recoup the cost by hiring it out for haymaking and harvest; the only use for horses here was to move the machine from one place to another. Many of these ponies were Shetlands, as their small size was combined with great strength. A stud farm for the sole purpose of breeding ponies for the pits was established in 1825 by colliery owner Frederick Stewart, 4th Marquess of Londonderry, and the Shetland Pony Stud Book Society was formed in 1830 to stop the use of the best stallions in the pits. A horse called "Robbie", probably the last to work underground in a British coal mine, was retired from a mine at Pant y Gasseg, near Pontypool, in May 1946. As thousands of animals were drafted for the war effort, some breeds were so reduced in number that they were in danger of disappearing. They compete in all equestrian disciplines, carry riders from novice to advanced on trekking and trail-riding holidays, work in riding schools, provide therapy for the disabled, and are much-loved companions and hacks. The horses and riders of Great Britain have won numerous medals for eventing in equestrian sports at the Summer Olympic Games.

Header Pool Noodle Ponies: What to do with Your New Herd Hurray for summer! If you are a teacher, it means a slightly slower schedule but many projects. This series of blog posts will inspire you to get started on a few projects of your own. Check out that post HERE to learn how to create these adorable creatures! Last summer I gained an entire herd of noodle ponies. I had been in a car accident, so I really just supervised their construction. My fabulous sister in law manned the pony factory and created them. We decided to use a western themed duct tape to bind them together. I love how that turned out! Now that you have created a herd of noodle ponies, what can you do with them? Here are a few ideas: You may have learned this version in elementary school. Check out this link to learn about pioneer living and daily chores. This song transforms into a perfect pool noodle pony song! Take a look at a video of some of my Kindergarteners using their ponies with this song. This is an adaptation of an activity by the amazing Artie Almeida. Here are some of the lyrics we use: This is the way we walk our horse 2. This is the way we pet our horse 3. This is the way we trot our horse 4. This is the way we water our horse 5. This is the way we jump our horse 6. This is the way we feed our horse 7. This is the way we race our horse 8. This is the way we brush our horse 9. This is the way we trade our horse Chaotic but fun! This is the way we stable our horse put horses back in their tub "stable" 2. We keep the steady beat on our laps like singing. Then we change the lyrics so that old Joe can walk, run, jump, skip, dance etc After learning this song it is great fun to act it out with the pool noodle ponies. On the "A" section, ponies trot in a circle. Use instruments or other movement during the other sections. Wild Donkeys from Carnival of the Animals This quick little piece called "Wild Asses" in most translations is perfect for getting the wiggles out with a noodle pony ride. I have about 8 students line up with their ponies. Four students on one side of the room and their partner on the other side. Students switch places with their partner by galloping with their noodle. They start when the music starts and stop when the music stops. This activity is usually used with several Carnival of the Animals activities. Read more about those HERE. I use it more as an opportunity for them to get to hear the piece over and over in an exciting way. When we go back to listen to the pieces from CofA they really know this one! There are many other ways to use the ponies in your classroom.
