The most important thing to understand about pet insurance is what is covered and what is not. Some policyholders think that pet insurance automatically covers all medical expenses but every policy has different limits and exclusions. Before purchasing pet insurance, read the plan carefully so you have an understanding of what illnesses, medical visits, medication, etc. Emergency visits because of an accidental injury may be covered, but routine wellness visits may not. And in many cases, cosmetic procedures, boarding and grooming, and supplements will not be covered. All insurance policies stipulate limits of their coverage. Typically, pet insurance will have limits per accident or illness, as well as a limit for the policy term. Out-of-pocket deductibles can be based on both a per-inside and per-policy term basis. Find out what the limits of coverage are, and if they could cover a reasonable portion of expensive procedures. Pets with existing conditions or advanced age may be refused coverage or might require higher premiums to cover their medical insurance. Be sure to read carefully to determine if your pet will incur any extra costs. Can coverage be denied? If you have pet insurance, you might assume that it will cover all medical issues and expenses, but many times coverage can be denied. Most pet insurance policies have a low end and a high end to sign up for a new policy. Make sure the plan covers the current age of your pet. Healthcare providers Insurance companies may work with and cover different medical providers, which takes the pressure off you to find one. Do the service providers have good reviews?: Check out the fine print to find out if service providers are prescribed by the insurance network, and if so, do a little investigative research to find out how reputable they are. Can you use providers out of network?: Such policies may cover both in and out-of-network providers, but the latter can sometimes cost more. Find out which vets your policy allows and if the coverage is the same for out-of-network vets. Similar to human health insurance, pet insurance also has premiums, deductibles, co-pays and maximum payouts. The premium is the amount you pay monthly, quarterly or annually for your insurance policy. The deductible is the amount of the vet bills you have to reach before the insurance company starts to pay. Higher deductibles usually mean a lower premium, but more of your money is invested over the initial medical expenses. For example, your policy might stipulate that you pay 20 percent and the insurance company pays 80 percent. Higher co-pays will lower your premium as well but will increase your out-of-pocket payments for each expense. When determining reimbursement, also keep in mind that some pet insurance policies pay out as a percentage of the invoice while others pay out on certain amounts for certain conditions or operations, no matter what the bill was. Most insurance policies will determine a maximum amount of money they will give you, whether it is a certain amount each year, per event or during the lifetime of your policy. Once it is reached, you will not receive any more money. Health expenses In deciding whether or not to purchase insurance, try to estimate what your average veterinary health expenses are and will be in the future. How old are your pets? Are they in fairly good shape, or do they require medication or have a chronic illness? Do you live in a safe, quiet environment, or is the pet exposed to things like other pets, cars on the road, ticks, etc. Certain breeds or animals are at higher risk for health issues than others and some may even be excluded from certain insurance policies. Insurance company reputation Pet insurance providers should have a good reputation for helpful customer service, reliable coverage and good value. Insurance companies should offer different plans and extensive coverage options for different conditions. Find out as much as possible about what kind of experience other customers have had with the insurance company and be aware of any complaints people have made about them. Find out what the process is to file a claim. Is it simple and hassle-free, or will you be on the phone with customer service for hours at a time? Does the insurance company typically fight claims or do they reimburse expenses? If so, how long does it typically take for the company to reimburse you? Types of pet insurance coverage

Top Basic coverage This traditional form of pet insurance coverage mirrors your typical human health insurance plan. It generally covers anything accidental, such as unforeseen injuries or illnesses—even poisonings. Basic coverages typically include deductibles and caps on total payouts per policy term.

Comprehensive coverage While covering most everything that a traditional basic plan would cover, comprehensive takes pet insurance one step further by including preventive care such as vet visits, X-rays and vaccinations and prescription medicines.

Wellness plans Want coverage to help finance for routine care? Then a pet wellness plan is for you, to help pay for annual exams, teeth cleanings, vaccinations and other similar preventative treatments.

Vet packages and network plans Additional pet insurance-like pet products are often sponsored by veterinarians themselves or in conjunction with pet stores. For instance, certain vets will offer their customers essentially what are package deals, which provide discounts on care and checkups. Or vets and pet stores may team up to offer plans that give discounts on surgeries and care, as well as on pet food and other supplies.

Other coverage For pets that are exotic or worth a lot to their owners, life and theft insurance can be bought as a separate plan. Pet owners can also consider liability coverage to protect them should their pet bite or harm another person. People who should consider buying pet insurance

Top First-time pet owners People getting pets for the first time will want the security of pet insurance, especially if the pet is young, like a puppy. Puppies are more likely to get sick and having pet insurance can help a new owner get through a stressful time without having to also worry too much about expenses.

Pet owners with older pets Owners with aging pets need insurance to cover any diseases that may arise and to continue any treatments for existing conditions.

Owners with multiple pets People with more than one pet can potentially save a lot of money with pet insurance. Paying for services individually is sure to add up over time, and having insurance will keep out-of-pocket expenses low.

Owners of young pets Owners with young pets will find that trips to the vet during the first year is routine. From vaccinations to checkups, pet health insurance can help off set the cost of those visits.

We value your privacy. What to consider when choosing an in-home care provider Service availability Home health aide schedules vary between agencies. This can impact affordability and convenience when hiring a service. Home for the holidays: Does the agency offer holiday service? Many elderly people celebrate in their own homes, making it crucial for an assistant to be available during these days. Not all seniors need round-the-clock care, so a part-time option helps keep costs low. Family members responsible for primary care may face a late day at the office, bad traffic or any number of factors that could leave them running late. Be sure that a caregiver can remain on site when a complication arises. Family caregivers need breaks from time-to-time to tend to their own needs. Home health aides can fill in so that the care recipient remains safe while the family caregiver is away. Clear communication Communication between the family of the senior receiving care and the provider organization is critical to creating a comprehensive schedule of services. Slow response times could leave a senior alone, or put them in danger by delaying reports on issues that could impact their health. For many people, caring for an elderly parent does not reduce other demands on their time, leaving them to schedule around school plays, nights out with friends and work functions. Flexible and emergency scheduling is a must. As effective as voice mail can be, waiting for a call back can be nerve wracking. Make sure your service provider routinely answers the phone, rather than responding to messages. Provider screening Any time you let someone into your home, you take a risk. The elderly are particularly at risk, so before inviting someone in, it is important that they pass screening and a background check which should be provided by the agency. A credit check and scan of criminal history could provide a sense of security. Reference checks are a quick and easy way to find out whether someone has a history of quality performance, and they are also something that many employers neglect to do. Instead of simply assigning someone to a case, it is important to allow the caregiver, senior and their family to meet in an informal environment. Compatibility is a foundation for building trust. Absentee policies Everyone needs a day off occasionally, so what happens when a caregiver calls out? Before sending a replacement, the agency should notify you of the conflict. You might prefer to take some time off rather than have a stranger take on the job. If they have a call out, can the agency send out someone else without missing the service window? While occasional call outs are inevitable, repetitive issues with missed work can be a major issue. It is important to know how many you might deal with from a single provider. Cost When trying to provide care on a limited budget, the cost can be a major issue. Medicare rarely covers in-home care costs, leaving much of it to be out-of-pocket. You can see what benefits you or your loved one are eligible for by visiting benefits. Long-term care insurance and Medicare supplemental insurance might be viable options to help cover costs. Is there a daily maximum on charges? Hourly charges can rack up fast, particularly for those that need round-the-clock care. If the primary aide only helps around the house, but is supplemented with a physical therapist or nurse, is there an additional charge for these occasional services? There almost always is. Types of home care services Top Home health aides Home health aides are professionals who can help with self-care, housework, cooking and more. They might also perform some basic medical tasks. Home health aides sometimes have medical training, so they might be certified nursing assistants CNAs or licensed practical nurses LPNs. Medicare or Medicaid might pay for help from a home health aide. Nurses Home care nurses often handle the basic medical needs of those aging in place, like tracking their vitals, giving them IV medications and changing bandages. The higher level of care a person needs, the more likely their nurse will be an RN. Sometimes, a nurse will visit a patient less frequently but will manage a team of home health aides that visits the person every day. Medicare or Medicaid might pay for help from a home care nurse. Geriatric care managers Geriatric care managers are professionals that help caregivers figure out how much care their loved one needs and what living situation might be best for them. They also help caregivers and families navigate the medical system and figure out how to pay for care and hire appropriate home care professionals. Geriatric care managers often have backgrounds in gerontology, social work, nursing, psychology or another related field. Companion services Companion services vary a lot. Companions might just be someone who keeps your loved one company, or they might also offer transportation and housekeeping services. You may be able to find a community service organization, like Volunteers of America, that provides these services for free. Meals on Wheels Meals on Wheels is a national organization that operates in most communities in the United States. It works with local businesses and volunteers to serve meals to people over The organization delivers meals to people in their homes, and the volunteers who drop meals off provide some companionship to seniors. The group also serves meals in local community centers, so people who can drive can get out of the house to socialize. These services are free or low-cost, depending on where you live. Community villages Villages are non-profit organizations designed to help people age in place. Villages coordinate volunteers and paid workers to organize social and educational activities. Villages typically offer transportation services and limited in-home assistance as well as discounted services from health professionals. Each village is independently operated, so the services offered in your area will vary. The programs provide as much care as feasibly possible to people in their own homes. For example, someone in a state with PACE might be eligible for in-home care, social work counseling and many other services. Programs in different parts of the country have slightly different offerings, but the overall goal is to keep people in their own homes as long as possible. How to choose a home care provider Top 1. Write down all the care services needed Start by making a complete list of all the tasks you or your loved one needs help with. Once you have this list, you can decide whether you need one provider or a few with different specialties. Screen over the phone first Next, call the companies that advertise the services you need and confirm that their employees can do everything needed. Use the list of questions from Eldercare. Make sure you and the care recipient feel comfortable and confident. Run a background check Run a background check on each individual who will be helping your loved one in their home. Expert reviews for home care service providers Top Carelinx is a caregiver marketplace that allows individuals and families across the country find and hire quality caregivers. The online platform makes it easy to pay and manage caregivers, even if you are living in a different city or state than your loved one.

It is strongly recommended that, in order to achieve positive emotional and behavioral change, you follow the plan exactly. You will find suggestions for additional support materials in the Resources section. Skinner Dogs learn mainly in two ways; they learn by consequence and they learn by association. Operant Conditioning is a type of learning in which an animal modifies behavior based on consequences. Skinner coined the term Operant Conditioning in to refer to his theory of how animals learn. A Practical Guide OC: The antecedent is what happens right before the behavior. The behavior is what the dog does, and the consequence is what happens right after the behavior. The application or removal of something to increase the occurrence of a behavior Punishment: The application or removal of something to decrease the occurrence of a behavior Reinforcer: Reinforcing a desirable behavior which is incompatible with the undesirable behavior. For example, using a bit of chicken to reinforce sitting and making eye contact with you instead of barking at another dog. In Operant Conditioning, behavior falls into four quadrants: For example, reinforcing with a treat for walking by your side. When an aversive that is already present is removed, which causes behavior to increase. In Negative Reinforcement the dog is either trying to escape or avoid. For example, a dog is barking and growling at a stranger, and handler grabs dog by the scruff and shakes him. For example, the dog is pulling on leash and the handler stops and stands still until the dog stops pulling. The forward motion the dog enjoyed was removed. The positive and negative modifiers indicate whether something was added or taken away. Classical Conditioning employs associative learning. A Practical Guide CC- Classical Conditioning, sometimes called Respondant or Pavlovian Conditioning , is a type of learning in which a behavior conditioned response comes to be elicited by a stimulus conditioned stimulus that has acquired its power through an association with a biologically significant stimulus unconditioned stimulus.

There are also minerals and vitamins to consider. Here are a few important ones to look for in dog food: Calcium helps form strong bones and protect your dog against bone deformities. Calcium can also grow muscles and regulate the nervous system. Calcium comes from dairy products, raw bones, and some fish and vegetables. Magnesium helps the body absorb calcium and even has its own bone-strengthening properties. Several vegetables and seafood provide magnesium. Phosphorus can aid in blood coagulation and regulation of the nervous system. Phosphorus mainly comes from protein sources, like meat and dairy ingredients. Dairy, grains, fruits, and vegetables are all good sources of sodium. Vitamins A and E: These vitamins both contain powerful antioxidants that boost the immune system and fight the effects of aging. Liver, eggs, and carrots are great sources of Vitamin A, and seeds and leafy green veggies provide Vitamin E. As great and essential! In most cases, choosing the right dog food for his breed will give him everything he needs. Voice your concerns to your vet. He or she can tell you if your dog needs any supplements, and will recommend a supplement that will give your dog the proper amounts of what he needs. What Nutrients Do Dogs Need? So, just what does your dog need in his food to have a healthy diet? Just as humans have different dietary needs, dogs do too. But, generally, dogs do need at least three important nutrients in their food to keep their bodies functioning properly. But, these three nutrients are important for keeping him in shape, giving him energy, and aiding proper digestion. Carbohydrates Carbohydrates get a bad rep in the human world. But, they are actually essential parts of our bodies that give us energy for activities and keep everything functioning properly. They do the same for dogs. Dogs, especially, need energy. Carbs in dog food come from several sources, like fruits, vegetables, whole grains, rice, and potatoes. Additionally, these carb-packed foods give your dog fiber, which helps keep the digestive process moving in the right direction. Fats Fat also may not sound like something you want in your dog food, but fat provides even more energy than carbohydrates. Your dog can get healthy fat in his diet from foods that contain healthy oils, like Omega-3 fatty acids and other fish oils, sunflower oil, and flaxseed oil. Proteins Protein in dog food usually comes from meat sources, like chicken, beef, and fish. But, eggs, dairy, and some grain products also provide good amounts of protein. Protein creates the amino acids your dog needs to repair tissues and muscles, grow hair, form healthy cells, regulate hormones, and more. Dogs can produce some essential amino acids on their own with their incredible bodies, but the rest needs to come from a healthy diet with protein. What is moisture content and why is it important? You can equate moisture content in dog food to water content in human food. Foods with higher water content are often easier to digest and ensure that we get enough water in our diet to prevent dehydration. Both the federal government and state governments oversee the regulations for Guaranteed Analysis on pet food. However, regulations require all pet food brands to display the minimum percentage of crude protein and crude fat, as well as the maximum percentage of moisture and crude fiber in their foods. Pet food companies can choose to provide more information voluntarily, unless they need to prove claims they make on the bag or in advertisements. All dog food companies must place their full ingredients list on their products, so there can be no deceiving you if you know what to look for and how to break it down. Companies list their ingredients according to weight, in descending order. So, the first ingredient listed is the heaviest one in the formula. Meat is predominantly water, which can make it heavier than other ingredients. If the ingredients list a meat meal first, the food likely has a good amount of meat content. One trick some companies use to deceive consumers is breaking apart larger ingredients into smaller ones to make them not seem as harmful. A dog food with a lot of grain ingredients, for example, may have broken-down ingredients, like ground wheat, wheat flour, corn gluten, and ground corn. These ingredients lumped together as corn or wheat would likely be the most prominent on the list otherwise. The best thing you can do is check the Guaranteed Analysis and ingredients list instead of relying on catchphrases on the bag. Until then, dog owners should trust their instincts and their knowledge. Complete, balanced nutrition is what we need to go with for our beloved dogs. Food and Drug Administration

FDA provides an excellent definition of what this term means for dog food: Therefore, every nutrient in the profile must meet the minimum recommended amounts. A nutritious food for your dog that can provide everything he needs for a balanced diet will often include, but not be limited to: Healthy Fruits And Vegetables Even though they love their meat, dogs can enjoy a good fruit or vegetable as much as humans do. Still, there are several fruits and veggies that will give your dog extra vitamins, minerals, antioxidants, and plenty of overall health benefits. The quality and type of grain are what makes the difference. Whole grains are an excellent source of fiber in dog food that helps keep the digestive track moving and healthy. Oats, quinoa, and brown rice are examples of excellent whole grains for your dog. Of course, some dogs are prone to allergies involving grains, which is why you see several Grain-Free formulas in the dog food aisle. Quality Proteins Of course, protein must be in a dog food for balanced nutrition. But, it can be difficult to distinguish quality proteins from the rest. What you want to focus on are complete proteins, also known as whole proteins. A whole protein is one that includes all essential amino acids that dogs need to thrive. Beef, liver, chicken, and fish are all excellent sources of protein. Extra Nutrients Some dog food companies place additional nutrients in their dog food that can keep his diet balanced. Sometimes "even better!" Chondroitin and glucosamine, for example, keep joints lubricated and working smoothly. The more nutrients that are packed in, the more beneficial for your dog. But, some ingredients can take a poor diet one step further and cross it into the danger zone. These are the most important types of ingredients to watch for: It sounds gross, but by-product and meat meals can give your dog excellent protein content in his diet. The problem lies in the quality of these protein sources. Named meat meals can be excellent protein sources. Generic by-products can contain dead or dying livestock, road kill, and anything in between. Named by-products typically come from a trusted source. Harmful Chemicals And Preservatives Most dog food must be preserved somehow, just like human food. But, you may not know what distinguishes a good preservative from a bad one. The most important thing to look for is super long, confusing names that sound like chemicals. If it looks like a chemical and sounds like a chemical, it probably is a chemical. For example, here are some common chemical preservatives that should not be in dog food, but unfortunately are: Ethoxyquin Butylated hydroxytoluene BHT Propylene Glycol PG Companies use these chemicals to preserve dog food for longer because they help keep fat from turning rancid. Natural, healthy preservatives will come in the form of vitamins and other natural sources. Unhealthy Grains And Fillers Unhealthy grains usually make their way into dog food as fillers. They have no nutritional value for your dog. They provide little nutritional content and often replace more high-quality ingredients to cut costs. Poorly-Regulated Food Do you know where your dog food comes from? Additionally, even those made in the United States may contain ingredients from other countries, like China. If this loophole bothers you, your best bet is to do plenty of research on a company before purchasing its dog food. A respectable company will have no problem being transparent about where it gets its ingredients. Look for information on the website, or give a quick phone call, to find out more information. They can also cause severe health problems. Certain dog food formulas have been linked to severe digestive problems, allergies, and even death. Food additives, like chemical preservatives and unnecessary dyes, can cause disobedience and hyperactivity. Certain food dyes may even cause cancerous tumors. So, you now know what to look for on an ingredients list. But, what about other food that exists outside of dog food? Instead, we can go over a few general rules for feeding your dog safely. First, avoid overly-processed foods.

How to look after and care for a dog Owing a dog is great fun and immensely rewarding. But, dogs have complex needs and each dog is unique. Give a home to a rescued dog We rescue and rehome thousands of dogs each year - each one comes with a unique personality ready made. There are many different breeds and types of dog, all varying in size, body shape and personality. Take a look around and get to know your dog a little better Dogs have highly developed senses Dogs have an incredibly well-developed sense of smell, far superior to humans. At certain frequencies, dogs can detect sounds up to four times quieter than humans can hear. Dogs can also hear in ultrasound, which is sound with a frequency greater than the upper limit of human hearing. Dogs can see better than humans in dark and dim light. Dogs are diverse Dogs are extremely diverse in both size and shape. For example, there is over a fold difference in weight between the Chihuahua 1kg and the St Bernard kg. Dogs use a range of methods to communicate Communication is very important in helping dogs form and maintain social groups. To transmit scent information, dogs use urine, faeces and secretions from special scent glands. Dogs produce a range of sounds, often in complex combinations, including whines, whimpers, growls, barks and howls. Many dogs can use their body, face, tail, ears and limbs to communicate with other dogs. Dogs are athletic The fastest recorded speed for a greyhound is 42 miles per hour, similar to that of a mounted racehorse, which can reach speeds of around 43 miles per hour! Dogs are naturally inquisitive Dogs actively seek information about their surroundings and will spend much time investigating and exploring. Feral dogs will naturally roam for great distances in search of food. Dogs are omnivores Dogs eat both meat and plant food, so are called omnivores. Whilst dogs do have teeth designed for tearing meat, compared to other carnivores dogs have more molars, which are used for crushing and grinding plant food. Dogs are highly social Many dogs enjoy the company of other dogs , but they will also form strong social bonds to humans, becoming very attached to particular individuals. Dogs are intelligent Dogs can learn the names of their toys. For example Rico, a border collie, learnt the names of toys and can reliably fetch the correct toy when asked to. Dogs are playful Dogs use special signals to show they want to play. Assistance dogs can help blind, deaf and disabled people, whilst some dogs can even help alert owners before an epileptic fit starts. Dogs can be trained to detect drugs, explosives, termites, and even some diseases such as cancer and diabetes.

Chapter 7 : A Complete Guide: How To Introduce A Dog To A Cat For The First Time - Practical Pet Care

Classical Conditioning: A Practical Guide CC- Classical Conditioning, (sometimes called Respondant or Pavlovian Conditioning), is a type of learning in which a behavior (conditioned response) comes to be elicited by a stimulus (conditioned stimulus) that has acquired its power through an association with a biologically significant stimulus.

Cat A Complete Guide: Some people love having both of them in their house and have been figuring out a way to help them live as harmoniously as possible. Here are some tips on how to painlessly introduce a dog to a cat for the first time so that they lead a happy life along with you despite their deep-seated drive to go against each other. Closely observe both of them. For example, if your dog has displayed signs of aggressive behavior towards smaller animals before, such as cats or squirrels, maybe your best bet is not to have a cat at all. Also, if your cat is timid and shy, pair it up with a dog that is of the same character. If your dog is too lively and loves chasing, your gentle cat might be stressed. You can also put a blanket with the smell of the cat in the room of your dog and vice versa so that you prevent them from being upset or surprised when they see each other face to face. Let it inspect the area without letting it in. This way the dog will realize the existence of a new member. Make sure that they are provided with enough food and toys as well as your attention. Getting ready for meeting in person For the purpose of sliding through the introduction process without a hitch, prepare both animals. On the other hand, the cat has to be accustomed to being in a small crate for short periods of time in order to be able to fulfill other steps of introducing your new dog to the cat. You might have to use some food or toys in order to lure it into the crate. The feline might seem frightened and unsteady in the crate so you may have to repeat the session a few times a day until it feels completely relaxed in the cage. Meanwhile, your dog should be confined in a separate room or out for a walk. First sessions should last for 5 minutes. The more relaxed and comfortable the animals get with each other the longer the sessions can be. Letting the cat loose in front of the dog This step involves the dog being on leash and cat trying to be at ease while moving freely around the canine. The dog should be in the lay-down position while the cat slowly gets out of the crate. Ideally, the dog will not pay attention to the cat. In order to deal with this, you can have someone take the dog outside for a few moments until the cat gets out of the crate. The dog, then, should be walked into the room slowly and on the leash. Unleashing the dog After 2 weeks, the pets are usually ready to be loose in front of each other. We still have to warn you that even after the period of introduction they may not be completely prepared to be left unsupervised. Some cats are very territorial and some dogs can get very prey-driven, which is why they have to be monitored at all times in order to stop them from fighting. Is it possible for a cat and a dog to get along well? It is definitely not unusual for a cat and a dog to be friends. Although it is not in their nature, with great care and patience of the owner, the likeliness for you to live with these 2 in harmony spikes to percent. Bear in mind, however, that you should not permit that they work it out on their own! This means that the probability of successfully introducing a dog to your cat significantly drops without proper attention given to their personalities, feelings and personal space. Apr 6, Admin2.
