Etymology[edit] The city of Buffalo received its name from a nearby creek called Buffalo Creek. The village of Buffalo in Walk-on-the-Water was the first steamboat to sail Lake Erie in The first inhabitants of the State of New York are believed to have been nomadic Paleo-Indians , who migrated after the disappearance of Pleistocene glaciers during or before BCE. These paths were later paved, and now function as major roads. The Iroquois were corralled onto reservations, including Buffalo Creek. His house was built at present-day Washington and Seneca streets. This was completed in , [38] and the new village boundaries extended from the creekside in the south to present-day Chippewa Street in the north and Carolina Street to the west, [39] which is where most settlers remained for the first decade of the 19th century. Several blocks to the southeast he designed a semicircle fronting Main Street with an elongated park green, formerly his estate. Spafford noted in A Gazetteer of the State of New York that in fact, despite the growth the village of Buffalo had, Black Rock "is deemed a better trading site for a great trading town than that of Buffalo," especially when considering the regional profile of mundane roads extending eastward. General Peter Buell Porter is said to have had five slaves during his time in Black Rock, and several news ads also advertised slaves for sale. By , the population was , with many people farming or doing manual labor. The Irish immigrants planted their roots along the railroad-heavy Buffalo River and Erie Canal to the southeast, to which there is still a heavy presence today; German immigrants found their way to the East Side, living a more laid-back, residential life. Both passenger and commercial traffic expanded with some 93, passengers heading west from the port of Buffalo. The city got the nickname City of Light at this time due to the widespread electric lighting. The New Deal relief programs operated full force. The city became a stronghold of labor unions and the Democratic Party. Major companies such as Republic Steel and Lackawanna Steel employed tens of thousands of Buffalonians. Integrated national shipping routes would use the Soo Locks near Lake Superior and a vast network of railroads and yards that crossed the city. Lobbying by local businesses and interest groups against the St. Lawrence Seaway began in the s, long before its construction in , which cut the city off from valuable trade routes. Its approval was reinforced by legislation shortly before its construction. The trend of back offices opening in the area began in the s. Relative to downtown, the city is generally flat with the exception of area surrounding North and High streets, where a hill of 90 feet gradually develops approaching from the south and north.
