Anna Matilda and Mary Aletta. Mary and John embarked in November , and arrived in Honolulu on May 21, , on the Gloucester, along with the ninth company sent by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. John Davis Paris with his youngest children Mary Paris died in , and John Paris returned to the United States with his two young daughters on the ship Montreal in . They decided to return to Hawaii, left in November and arrived in March . This time he was posted to the slightly less remote Kona District on the same island. Paris built a smaller but longer-lasting stone church called Kahikolu on the foundation of the old one. This material would prove to be stronger than the previous materials. The workers trained in these new techniques were applied to more projects in the area. Paris mentioned he was saddened by how the land was being bought up by outsiders. His last church was Lanakila Church in Kainaliu , started in and completed in . In Paris and his wife moved to Honolulu , where he founded the theological department of the North Pacific Institute. In he retired and moved back to Kona, where his son had become a rancher. At first, Paris welcomed the help. Kaona had grown up in the area, and served in the government of the Kingdom of Hawaii as a district judge and in its House of Representatives in . Kaona claimed he was a prophet sent to warn of the end of the world. Paris learned that Kaona had been sentenced to an asylum a few years earlier after claiming he could raise someone from the dead. Paris tried to lock the Lanakila Church, but the door fell off its hinges and Kaona claimed it was a miracle. When the Kaonaites occupied the church and refused to leave, a local judge ordered it closed and the occupiers evicted. Neville here in his previous function as fire chief died in the uprising. Kaona told people to withdraw their children from school and join him in a communal home at the shore. Kaona had his followers chant Psalm for seven days while beating drums made from sugar kegs and tin pots. They wore white robes and flew seven banners because they thought the number seven to be mystical. Although they attempted to pay rent, William F. Roy, the lease-holder of the land asked them to leave. Neville tried to evict them on October 16, , they refused. Neville had been fire chief of Honolulu, but moved to Kona for what he hoped would be a quieter life. The Sheriff of Hilo , J. Coney, also arrived with about men, and the two groups captured the Kaonaites. His charge was reduced to manslaughter and he was sentenced to ten years of hard labor. Kahikolu Church was damaged on August 21, , by an earthquake centered almost under the church.
