There he hoped to find bigger markets and more opportunities. There, Richardson began to sell the home remedies that he had developed over the years. In , he introduced a product that was destined to make him a fortune, Vicks Magic Salve, a cure for croup. The origin of the name Vicks has been clouded by time. However, according to company lore, Lunsford Richardson thought his own name was too long and cumbersome to attach to a product. He decided to use the shorter Vicks, in honor of his brother in law Joshua Vick, a doctor in Selma. Richardson quickly tired of fighting with the other stockholders in the company about what to do with the profits. While he wanted to put any profits back into the business to finance more advertising, they wanted them as dividends. As a result, Richardson sold his share of the business in Richardson took his savings and opened a new business, Vick Family Remedies Company, this time owned solely by him. He made twenty one different remedies under the Vicks name, and marketed them in twenty surrounding counties. In , he asked his oldest son Henry Smith Richardson to be advertising and sales manager for the fledgling company in hopes that his son could rescue it. Smith Richardson, as he was called, attended Davidson College for a time before transferring to the Naval Academy. He was dismissed from the Academy for low grades in , during a purge that resulted in the dismissal of nearly a fourth of the cadets. Following his expulsion, Smith went to New York and worked in a number of jobs. He joined Bedford and was working for that company when his father requested his help. Richardson was an aggressive salesman and an innovative advertising manager. He traveled all over North Carolina, and then the southeast, from drugstore to drugstore, and country store to country store, selling VapoRub. First he and the sales force traveled by horse and buggy, and then by Model T Ford. For his efforts, Smith Richardson was made a partner in Vick Chemical Company was one of the first businesses to use such techniques as road signs, store displays, street car advertising, "mark out" slogans, and free samples. When the company began expanding its territory north and west, it was one of the first companies to take advantage of Rural Free Delivery, by sending samples through the mail. By , he was made a partner. The great influenza epidemic of gave VapoRub a tremendous boost. The company produced VapoRub twenty four hours a day, and still could not keep up with the demand. In , Lunsford Richardson died, leaving a booming business to his two sons. The company grew rapidly in the s. Another plant was built in Philadelphia in Also in , VapoRub was exported overseas to England, and south to Mexico. An export department was opened in New York in , to handle what was to become big business for the company, selling VapoRub overseas. In , the Richardsons decided to sell one fourth of their stock in Vick Chemical Company to the public. The stock was primarily bought by employees and people in the drug trade. Smith Richardson turned over the presidency to his brother Lunsford in , and took on the responsibility of long range planning for the now very successful business. He realized that Vick Chemical Company was a one product organization, that the growth potential of that product was limited, and that the company needed to diversify. Despite the stock market crash of and the economic chaos that followed, Vick Chemical Company continued to do well. People still caught colds, depression or no depression. Both were almost instantly successful. Although Vick did well, some of the other Drug Inc. As a result, Drug Inc. The same year, Vick merged with the William J. changed its name in to Richardson Merrell, Inc. It acquired still more divisions and exported many of its products all over the world. In , the company decided to narrow its focus from pharmaceuticals to consumer products. The company produced and sold the traditional cold care products like VapoRub, cough syrup, and cough drops; and many other products including Vidal Sasoon and Pantene hair care products, and Clearasil and Oil of Olay face care products. After eighty prosperous years, the Richardsons were forced to give up the company that made their fortune on the contents of "the little blue jar," Vicks VapoRub. The collection consists of the files of H. Coverage of the years before is scant, consisting of a few mementoes and some correspondence. Coverage of the years to is very uneven. A notable exception is material from the Advertising and Sales Department, which is nearly complete from to Every attempt was made during processing to preserve or reconstruct the original order of these files. This proved difficult for most of the material since the records reached the Southern Historical Collection in much disarray. The arrangement of Series 1, Subseries 2. In other cases, material has been organized into series and subseries primarily according to subject matter, and within each series and subseries in alphabetical order according to the original folder titles. All discernible original folder titles have been preserved, and the original order of items within folders has been maintained.
