Fort Worth, Texas, Ships to: This is a recent re-release of our popular 29th Infantry Series 2 DVD that was originally done in This DVD does have additional footage that our first release does not have. Be sure to get more footage on the 29th Infantry in our Series 1 "Invasion of Normandy", which covers from before D-Day to early August The following 26 different units are also represented in our Series 2 Liberation of Western Europe collection, be sure to check them out. This DVD video contains the official and actual combat camera footage of the 29th Infantry Division after Normandy as they capture Brittany and then move into Belgium towards Germany. There is approximately 58 minutes of total footage. This is a collection of excerpts from the official, silent, black and white, 35mm reference reels stored at the National Archives in Washington D. The th, th, and th Signal Photo Companies originally captured the footage; it was then turned over to the National Archives for preservation where it has sat for 65 years. There are sometimes many combat units represented on one reel, due to the procedure that the Archives used when the original reels were cataloged. However, this Combat Reels DVD has been edited to strictly contain only footage of the 29th Infantry Division and only shows other unit footage when two or more divisions are intertwined. A reference page begins each chapter describing the available information for the coming images. The reels used for this video have all been positively identified to contain film footage covering the 29th Infantry Division. The division had just been assigned the responsibility of assisting with the capture of the port city of Brest. Series II "Liberation of Western Europe" begins here and continues through to late November as the 29th Division fights deeper into Germany after the capture of Setterich. Series II timeline footage begins with scenes from the area around Brest, France. Then the 29th is shown on the move to the north where they participate in some rest and training in Holland. See troops of the 29th then resume the attack at the German -Holland border. The 29th then attacks towns like Bettendorf, Baiseweller, Maastricht fighting in some cases house to house. The series closes with scenes of the men of the 29th Div. Enjoy these close up shots of the actual locations the 29th Division fought for and occupied. Some of the footage can appear darker than other parts due to possible abnormal exposure of the original film. The close-up shots are great for persons trying to identify relatives or historians just wanting to see the original uniforms and equipment of this particular unit. Shoulder patches and helmet markings are quite common, as well as vehicle bumper markings. There are shots of officers from the 29th, as well as your average grunt. There is some of this footage you may have seen in documentaries about World War II, however, most of the footage you will have never seen before. At Combat Reels we are huge fans of WWII documentaries and the general history of this conflict, and we have never seen most of this footage before. Our goal at Combat Reels is to provide all fans and historians of World War II with a quality research tool covering as many combat units as possible. There is not DVDs of this nature currently available anywhere else. We have spent countless hours in the archives researching the endless reels of footage to bring all of it forward to the public. All of the images have been watermarked with a Combat Reels logo, which is not obstructive to the images. This is done to prevent theft of our exhaustive research efforts concerning commercial usage. After Sicily, the Old Reliables were sent to England to re-equip and train for the impending cross-channel invasion of France. The Division advanced to cut off the Cotentin Peninsula and assisted in the capture of the fortified French port city of Cherbourg. In July, the division participated in the breakthrough at St. The Old Reliables then swept across northern France. The 9th Infantry Division lost 4, soldiers killed in combat, 16, wounded, missing in action, and captured. Their total of battle and non-battle casualties represented more than percent of their authorized strength. Shortly after the war, the 9th Infantry Division was inactivated. Nevertheless, they were re-activated on July 15, at Fort Dix, NJ, serving some 15 years before being inactivated once more. On February 1, , however, the Old Reliables were called on again. Its area of operations was in the rivers and canals of the Mekong Delta from to Army was utilizing an amphibious force operating afloat. The force was a complete package, independent of fixed support embarked or in tow. The troops lived on barracks ships docked at the MRF anchorage. On tactical operations, Navy armored troop carrier boats, preceded by minesweeping craft and escorted by armored boats monitors transported the soldiers along the vast waterways in the Delta. This base was named Dong Tam, a acre island created among inundated rice paddies by dredging earth from the bottom of the Mekong River. During the Tet Offensive in , the 9th Infantry Division engaged in bitter fighting in the Saigon area. As part of the U. The 3rd Brigade stayed in Vietnam and fought in Cambodia until October Elements of the 9th Infantry Division had served 1, days in Vietnam. Beginning in the mids, the division served as the high-technology test-bed for the army. This led to the division testing the concept of "motorized infantry," designed to fill the gap between light infantry and heavy mechanized forces. The idea was to create lighter, mobile units capable of rapid deployment with far less aircraft than a heavier mechanized unit. Motorized infantry doctrine concentrated on effectiveness in desert warfare. The Division eventually fielded two brigades of motorized infantry in battalions of designated either "motorized" or "attack. The FAVs were prone to rollover and offered the crew little protection to enemy fire. They were eventually all replaced by versions of the humvee. The Old Reliables was one of the divisions identified for inactivation at the end of the Cold War. Although their special training and equipment made them a logical asset to deploy to the Gulf War, they did not deploy to the Middle East. Since the 9th Infantry Division was already in the process of inactivation, during Operation Desert Shield and Desert Storm, the division provided soldiers and equipment to fill out deploying units from other divisions and trained National Guard and Army Reserve units deploying to the Persian Gulf. The existing 3rd Brigade of the 9th Infantry Division did not inactivate and was instead reflagged as the th Light Infantry Brigade and assigned directly to I Corps. By December of , all of the units of the 9th Infantry Division had cased their colors.
