Businessman Greg Lindberg, whose companies are at the center of the federal probe, gave campaign cash to dozens of Florida politicians and political committees over an eight-month span. Recipients include powerful legislative leaders in line to control the Florida House and Senate for years to come. Federal investigators are separately seeking reams of documents from at least seven companies tied to Lindberg and Eli Global, the North Carolina-based investment firm he founded. None of those powerful state lawmakers professed to knowing who Lindberg was nor what his issues were. The page subpoena was sent to an official in the North Carolina Office of Insurance whose name was redacted. The official was subpoenaed to testify in front of a federal grand jury on Oct. Strickland did not return follow up questions about whether the two directly spoke at the event or where it was held. As CFO, Patronis has veto power over the selection of insurance commissioners. Most other recipients of five-digit contributions from Lindberg did not return requests seeking comment after the subpoena became public. Corcoran said he does not remember ever meeting Lindberg and was unaware of his issues at the state or federal level. He said he responded to the initial inquiry in August because he remembered getting a campaign check. Attorney for the Western District of North Carolina. Most of the companies listed on the subpoena have also been enmeshed in a lengthy fight with the Florida Office of Insurance Regulation going back to , according to court records, regulatory filings and OIR documents “ some of which are exempt from state public records laws ” reviewed by POLITICO over the past five months. Wrangling over that issue led to the consent order and Southland National Insurance Corporation, which was acquired by Eli Global in , not complying with that deal for the first three quarters of The web of companies on the radar of state regulators are part of Eli Global, a private company that Lindberg owns. Eli Global operates in industries beyond insurance, a sector in which it has several companies, including those targeted by federal investigators and Florida regulators. The companies listed on the federal subpoena and on the radar of Florida regulators are represented by well-known insurance lobbyist Fred Karlinsky , who co-chairs the insurance practice of lobbying and legal giant Greenberg Traurig. Underscoring the prestige of that position, the JNC is currently in a legal fight over whether Scott can fill three soon-to-be vacant posts on the Florida Supreme Court before his term as governor ends in January. Through a spokeswoman, he declined to comment Oct. An outside attorney working for Eli Global and Global Bankers Insurance Group, both of which are listed on the federal subpoena, on Oct. We are continuing to operate as usual, and our entire team is focused on serving our clients and businesses. The donation was from from Dunhill Holdings, a company in his name, to a state political committee controlled by Scott. It was the same month Lindberg attended the Patronis campaign fundraiser. The January consent order originally agreed to with OIR is littered with Lindberg companies now listed in the federal subpoena. Both are listed in the federal subpoena. Rather than making that transfer, though, Southland National Insurance Company ceded the policies to another Lindberg company called Southland National Reinsurance Incorporation, which was in violation of the order, according to the OIR. Southland National Reinsurance Corporation is a subsidiary of Southland National Holdings, which is also listed in the federal subpoena. Scott and Patronis are longtime political allies. The source of the cash influx is now becoming a more prominent figure as federal officials dig in to Eli Global and its affiliated companies. It showed Lindberg-owned insurers were facing reviews in Florida and North Carolina “ where he has already gained attention for becoming an overnight political rainmaker “ and a possible examination from a national insurance standards-setting group. In each instance, records point to regulators antsy that Lindberg was operating cash-strapped life insurance companies. The December update, given as Lindberg was ramping up his political efforts, was exempt from state public records laws because it detailed potentially active investigations, but was accidentally released as part of several public records requests made by POLITICO. As the Lindberg-owned insurers were facing scrutiny over their financial health, three of them “ Southland, Bankers and Colorado Bankers Life Insurance Co. American Academy Holdings is another Lindberg company listed, but has no apparent direct tie to the Florida insurance issues. It ultimately was sent to Craig Wright, the deputy commissioner who oversees life insurance, and Florida Insurance Commissioner David Altmaier. Despite inking huge political checks, Lindberg remains a somewhat mysterious figure in North Carolina politics. The issue was sent to administrative court in late April of that year, a month before Southland issued a plan to surrender its certificate of authority to operate in Florida. That plan prompted both sides to file a motion asking the court to relinquish the case back to OIR, a move that was approved. The July 29, filing of the motion came one day after top OIR officials met with Lindberg and high-level officials with his company. The plan Florida insurance regulators signed off on included Southland assigning its Florida policies to Bankers Life Insurance Company, which would then set up a trust holding percent of Southland liabilities to ensure there were reserves to support the new policies. A month later, Southland outlined a plan to cede the assets to Bankers National Insurance Corporation, as required by the order, and the near 10 months of non-compliance was dropped by OIR.

Establishment[edit] The Continental Army had been very disorganized from the start of the American Revolutionary War. After George Washington arrived in Boston, on July 4, , it had taken him a week to produce an accurate count of the soldiers in his army, which was 16,, far less than the 24, he had expected. Poorly trained and organized, by , both Washington and the Continental Congress felt that the Continental Army needed an inspector general. Members of the Continental Congress noted "the absence of a regular inspector," and, on April 18, , Congress requested a general to " inspect the magazines of provisions under the care of Commissary Wharton. At the time, the position had no military power. It gave the position a rank of major general , and laid out the tasks to be done by the inspector general. On June 22, , the Continental Congress temporarily directed the Adjutant General of the United States Army to serve as assistant inspector general. On March 5, , after St. Pike was soon killed in an explosion. The duties of inspector general were performed by Abimael Y. Nicoll, then senior inspector. Bell and various assistant adjutant generals acted as inspector general. Hayne resigned in , and was replaced by John Gadsden. Upon the outbreak of the American Civil War , all inspectors had retired or defected to the Confederate States of America. In , new inspectors were appointed, but they largely did what their superiors requested. There were many informally appointed inspectors. By late , "Nearly 1, other officers were on orders at one time or another to perform various types of inspection duties. He led the movement to give the position authority equivalent to other offices of the army. Marcy By , the inspectorate was being criticized by many, particularly for its "useless" reports. In , it was reduced by a law spearheaded by John Logan Chipman. On December 12, Congress declared that the rank of the senior inspector general of the United States Army would be brigadier general, placing it on an equal footing with other army departments. From then, it remained relatively unchanged, [45] until Joseph Cabell Breckinridge Sr. Lamont into six inspections districts, and the department was made independent, reporting directly to the Secretary of War and Commanding General of the United States Army , instead of various department commanders. Miles disliked the inspectorate, and nearly succeeded in abolishing it, in abolishing the inspection districts and the independence of the department. During the war, the department was increased in size, with 36 temporary inspectors being appointed, and later three permanently appointed. There was not much oversight, as Breckinridge was fighting in the war, and the department has been described as mostly existing on paper. By , it had one brigadier general, three colonels, four lieutenant colonels, and nine majors. Under them, the office came to be seen as an extension of the secretary of war and the chief of staff, with the two collaborating closely, and often sharing the same opinions. The inspector general became an increasingly well-respected role, with Thomas Henry Barry considering his inspector to be one of his most important staff officers. Through those years, the inspector general was one of the most prominent advocates of motorizing the army. With the passage of the National Defense Act, the size of the inspectorate was increased to a maximum of thirty-three officers, and the army itself was dramatically increased in size. The Inspectorate was also responsible for oversight of the education and training of both officers and men, and its reports largely shaped how the education of officers changed. The army was restructured again, with the Overman Act giving the president greater authority over the army. In July , the caseload of the inspectorate had increased percent in one year and by 65 percent in the three months after the declaration of war. The inspectorate was dramatically increased to meet the higher caseload, to the point that it struggled to find suitable inspectors to add, and began requesting former inspectors to come out of retirement. In September, there were 89 officers 30 regulars, 10 recalled regulars, and 49 reservists. In November, the department was again increased to officers and enlisted men. It rose to officers on November 12, , and peaked at in June Brewster was selected as inspector general of the American Expeditionary Forces. Inspectors were active in Germany until , France until and Russia until That same year, the inspectorate peaked at officers. By , 33 officers were in the Office of the Inspector General, while 54 remained at camps or in the geographical departments. In the office had handled about 9, actions, while in it was processing nearly 17, In , the inspectorate was allocated the responsibility of inspecting ten monuments and twelve parks. The department became responsible for inspecting the Civilian Conservation Corps in Office of The Inspector General of the United States Army By , all subordinate commanders from division level were given an inspector general under their control to conduct inspections and investigations as needed. The inspector general was responsible to the chief of staff, and responsive to the secretary of the army. The reorganization made the inspector general responsible for investigating the discipline, efficiency and economy of the army. They were particularly focused on training and combat readiness. Prior to this there was no provision for formal instruction, although the old Inspector General Department had maintained and distributed instructional material to each inspector general; including guides, handbooks and other procedural material. General Order 40, dated August 24, , placed these inspections under the jurisdiction of the inspector general. The March revised AR , creating a policy for inspector general technical proficiency inspections. The work of the inspector general was shared with allies, when the OTIG gave a course of instruction to groups composed entirely of foreign officers. Additionally, the inspector general system became automated.. Mills was nominated by Wayne as a permanent inspector general, but he was instead appointed as acting inspector general. All four served at various times as acting inspector general and Adjutant General.

Everybody does it, but you never know when inspector Captain Renault is going to shut you down. It keeps us journalists in business. Without leaks, the public would be informed essentially by press releases. Americans would know no more than their government wanted them to know. That said, the confirmation that the FBI leaks just like the rest of the U. His investigation found that senior FBI officials, including Comey himself, also used private emails to conduct official business. But Agent Peter Strzok did. Horowitz found that on Oct. Horowitz notes the warrant at the time appeared to be under seal from a federal court. The report is also highly critical of Strzok and Page for using FBI phones and devices to share their negative views on Trump. This is the bureau that is supposed to investigate leaks; it can destroy powerful Washington figures like General David Petraeus , who pleaded guilty to lying to the FBI about giving his mistress and biographer his personal notebooks that contained code-word sensitive information about his time as commander in Afghanistan. Petraeus managed to avoid jail time. But lower-level leakers have not been so lucky. John Kiriakou served 30 months in prison for disclosing the identity of a CIA officer who helped capture al Qaeda operative Abu Zubaydah. Former NSA official Thomas Drake, who was charged with felony leaks, was ruined by the allegation even though the charges against him were dropped in Until recently the FBI itself was largely immune to the kinds of leak probes it conducts on everyone else in Washington. That appears to be changing. It accused him of lacking candor when asked about unauthorized disclosures to the media. Horowitz notes in his report this week that Comey himself urged the inspector general to look into leaks as well. That investigation is still ongoing. There is a danger to this zero-tolerance approach. The problem is not that there are too many leaks. Rather there are too many state secrets. The FBI cannot be expected to protect all of them. Better to narrow in on the kinds of state secrets really worth protecting, like the identities of Americans under court-ordered surveillance. The FBI, after all, has plenty of friends in the media. Waldheim served in the Austrian Army 1937 and attended the Vienna Consular Academy , where he graduated in Waldheim himself was politically unaffiliated during these years at the Academy. On 19 August , he married Elisabeth Ritschel in Vienna; their first daughter, Lieselotte, was born the following year. A son, Gerhard, and another daughter, Christa, followed. In December, he was wounded but returned to service in His service in the Wehrmacht from to was the subject of international review in and In his autobiography, he stated that he was discharged from further service at the front and, for the remainder of the war, finished his law degree at the University of Vienna , in addition to marrying in He said that he had known about some of the things that had happened, and had been horrified, but could not see what else he could have done. Waldheim later stated that "he did not know about the murder of civilians there". Diplomatic career[edit] Waldheim joined the Austrian diplomatic service in , after finishing his studies in law at the University of Vienna. In he was made Ambassador to Canada, returning to the Ministry in , after which he became the Permanent Representative of Austria to the United Nations in Shortly afterwards, he ran and was defeated in the Austrian presidential elections. United Nations Secretary-General[edit] Waldheim c. Waldheim with family c. Waldheim was supported by the Soviet Union and led the first two rounds of voting. Waldheim won an accidental victory in the third round of voting when those three permanent members failed to coordinate their vetoes and all abstained. As Secretary-General, Waldheim opened and addressed a number of major international conferences convened under United Nations auspices. These included the third session of the U. However, his diplomatic efforts particularly in the Middle East were overshadowed by the diplomacy of then U. Secretary of State , Henry Kissinger. In the telegram, Amin "applauded the massacre of the Israeli Olympic athletes in Munich and said Germany was the most appropriate locale for this because it was where Hitler burned more than six million Jews. He added that the secretary-general condemned any form of racial discrimination and genocide. However, China was still opposed to Waldheim and approached several Third World countries seeking challengers. China cast a single symbolic veto against Waldheim in the first round and voted for him in the second round, handing him an easy victory with 14 of 15 votes on the Security Council. President Jimmy Carter both recorded statements for the Voyager Golden Records , which were launched into deep space on the Voyager spacecraft in Near the end of his tenure as Secretary-General, Waldheim and British popular musician Paul McCartney organized a series of concerts for the People of Kampuchea to help Cambodia recover from the damage done by Pol Pot. China was determined to unseat him this time and lined up a strong candidate in Salim Ahmed Salim of Tanzania. In the first round of voting, Waldheim lost to Salim by one vote. The veto duel between China and the United States lasted a record 16 rounds. After six weeks of deadlock, Waldheim and Salim both withdrew from the race. Presidency of Austria[edit] Election and Waldheim Affair[edit] Waldheim had unsuccessfully sought election as President of Austria in , but his second attempt on 8 June proved successful. During his campaign for the presidency in , what became known internationally as the "Waldheim affair" began. His aides at the United Nations even accused the Israeli mission of spreading rumors that he supported the Nazis. But what could I do? I had either to continue to serve or be executed. Austria refused to pay compensation to Nazi victims, and from onwards refused to investigate Austrian citizens who were senior Nazis. Declassified documents from the U. Central Intelligence Agency show that the CIA had been aware of some details of his wartime past since These allegedly false documents were subsequently "discovered" by Benjamin Netanyahu in the UN file and triggered the "Waldheim Affair". Their report found no evidence of any personal involvement in those crimes. I could only reply what the committee of historians likewise made clear in its report: In favour of Waldheim is, that he only had very minor possibilities to act against the injustices happening. Actions against these, depending on which level the resistance occurred, were of very different importance. For a young member of the staff, who did not have any military authority on the army group level, the practical possibilities for resistance were very limited and with a high probability would not have led to any actual results. Resistance would have been limited to a formal protest or on the refusal to serve any longer in the army, which would have seemed to be a courageous act, however would have not led to any practical achievement. This marked the first time that a head of state had been put on an immigration watchlist. The same year, he was made an honorary member of K. Fischer also praised Waldheim for his efforts to solve international crises and for his contributions to world peace. Japan and Syria were the only two countries that laid wreaths on his grave. The episode aired 12 September Graphic novel and film Persepolis comics by Marjane Satrapi reference the election in Austria. Methods of Investigation To learn how to participate in conversation, you will have to observe it, be a part of it, think about it, and learn from your experiences. The question "How do people interact in English? It varies from person to person, situation to situation. This means forming your own questions and pursuing the answer yourself--the most successful language learners are careful observers. This also means changing your habits in order to apply what you learn. Only when you can do these things will you get the result that you want.

Investigation Procedure These methods are similar to those used by anthropologists to investigate new cultures. They are also useful for uncovering patterns of language use. For example, have you ever noticed that Americans seem to give a lot of compliments to each other? Why do they do this? Do they really mean it? Who should you give them to? Here is an example of how to pursue an answer to these questions: What do you believe you know about this type of speech behavior? What do you expect to find? Discuss your prediction with your classmates or teacher. Also, you get the feeling women give compliments to each other more often than men. Where do you think you can observe this behavior or find this information? You can use observation or your own experience, interviews of native speakers to find out what they would say or react, or you can use resources like books or the Internet. To try to find out if your impressions are true, you need a plan. Or you could prepare a list of questions about complimenting behaviors and ask different native speakers. You could even get an example on tape and ask native speakers how they feel about it from a cultural point of view. Remember, there are many different ways to look at any question. What different ways can you think of? Go out and get your information, from different sources if you can. This is where you go out and follow your plan. See the Warning below. Remember, you may have to change your plan or try it more than once for it to work. What did you find out? What do you think you learned? Did you uncover any patterns? In this step, be ready to report your insights to your classmates and teacher. Get their feedback to help you develop your own ideas. Look carefully at the data you collected. What do you see? Are there any patterns? Also, consider why you think the ideas you formed are true. How did you arrive at your conclusions? This is especially important. How can you reformulate your own behavior in interaction to make it more appropriate? How can you or other students use it? What should you do? How can this help you improve your conversational skills? This process may not be as easy as these five steps make it seem. Remember, however, that the answers are there if you learn how to look. Some helpful advice I can give you is: Different native speakers have different ways of doing the same thing. You may need to investigate the same speech behavior more than once and from more than one source to get a good idea. Collaborate with your classmates and check with your teacher often. This will help you gather more ideas form better guesses about what you are investigating. Think about how you are looking at or investigating a question. Is there a better way? Can you look at the same question from another point of view? This may help you find what you are looking for. How can you make contact with native speakers? Try joining a club. A listing of all of the clubs and student organizations at UF can be found at Student Clubs and Organizations.
