Sometimes I see it on my bookcase and groan, "You were so annoying! This only mattered when doing that "What is your porn name? As someone who was picked on mercilessly for her name I would trust in the character building of name calling and she chose it as her married name. She also had tons of books and cool categorizing methodology. I loved the two kids, their penchant for planning and carrying out schemes. I also loved running away fantasies the time I tried to carry it out is not a fun story. Schuyler Place started out cool. Stick it to the man, and taking over individual art and making every town look exactly the same those bastards! I have camp horror stories and I only went for two days. The View from Saturday is, to me, somewhere between these two books. The four kids are supposed to be shy rejects, according to the book jacket. Me at any age gets the feeling that these stories are written for a certain type of reader in mind: The parts of the book that annoyed the shit out of me was the teacher hand-picking the cream of the crop for her idyllic saturday meetings of precociousness. I liked it better when they separated and communicated their own lives through letters. The loggerhead turtles were the best. The kids worked together better, for me, in their own lives rather than organized hyper "We got better grades than you! That side of me is why I can still enjoy some kids books, I think. High fives are okay. When in grade school they made us write journals to our teachers. My teacher repeatedly made me start mine over. If there was the thing that anyone wanted to hear, I had no idea what it was. I just asked a lot of questions. They gave me another weirdo kid in Missouri to be a pen pal with. We wrote letters outside of class because we got in trouble for not sticking to the assignments. Mostly we just talked about how stuff sucked big surprise. What is the fun in that? Cookies would be nice. My twin says that they write in those kinds of adults to counteract those sleazy Nickelodeon type shows when the kids live in a world without adults. Those shows are annoying, this is true. And it was a letdown back then. Why do that to anybody?
