Sarah McCoy 3 I confess: I am a late-night reality TV binger. After a day of writing black and white words on a computer screen, wading into deep, quiet page pools, and capturing fantasy scenes as quick as my fingers can follow, my brain is pickled come nightfall. Judge as you may. At a particular hour, my mind goes flat as a penny, ready to be dropped in the candy turnstile for bubblegum reward. Here are some of the cards on my DVR deck: Box up the expensive word clutter and give it to the story Goodwill. A pretty face will only get you so far. Never underestimate the power of your unique voice. You lose those and all the rest is flotsam on the sea. That corroded oil lamp might be worth something Those usually prove the most valuable to the makeup of your characters and plot. At the end of your best or worst day, gathering round the table with your family for blessing and home cooking feels good. As writers, we often neglect our realities for the prose. We invest so much of ourselves in our craft that how the writing goes is how we go. A good writing day and we are Pollyannas. A bad writing day and we grump around the house, annoyed that the dog dared step in our path. It never fails to ground me and rejuvenate my creativity. Enclosed scenes are dramatic. Lock your characters together in a room be it a gated community or an island. Everyone wants the bylaws to writing prosperity. But the truth is, there is no set of commandments. One of my M. My shiny diploma would be a reminder that I exercised with experts and tested well. In the end, she said true success would only come when I threw the traditions out the window and journeyed on my own. That pretty much terrified me. Now, I realize how right she was. Never be afraid to shelf a project or even gasp! I have two entire novels in that garbage drawer and one novel on the maybe-another-day shelf. I had to write these books to be able to move on to better story ideas. Keep the pages under lock and key. Stroll through them from time to time if you like and maybe, one day, their season of bloom will come round A dysfunctional household begets progeny that may end up poisoning the whole lot. The Brits get it. Stop and examine your writing motives. Be real with yourself: If your aim has anything to do with money, power, fame, revenge, or recreating the death of your father to shame your mother, well, you got trouble in your household. All of these are toxic to your book and the writing community. To whom much is given, much is expected. They may drive you crazy, destroy your prized possessions, steal your best friend, and break your heart, but when it comes down to the brass tacks, your family will fight the paparazzi for you. In some ways, they might even be more you than flesh and blood. So forget everything else and fight for them.
