Visiting Arles, travelers tune into the story of Vincent van Gogh. In the dead of winter in , the year-old Dutch artist Vincent van Gogh left big-city Paris for Provence , hoping to jump-start his floundering career and social life. He was as inspired as he was lonely. For the next two years, he painted furiously, cranking out a masterpiece every few days. Only a few of the plus paintings that Van Gogh did in the south can be found today in the city that so moved him. But in Arles , you can walk the same streets he knew and see places he painted, marked by about a dozen steel-and-concrete "easels," with photos of the final paintings for then-and-now comparisons. Here are two examples, accompanied by the text from our book. He rented a small house on the north side of Place Lamartine. The house was destroyed in by an errant bridge-seeking bomb, but the four-story building behind it -- where you see the brasserie -- still stands find it in the painting. The house had four rooms, including a small studio and the cramped trapezoid-shaped bedroom made famous in paintings. It was painted yellow inside and out, and Vincent named it Freezing Arles was buttoned up tight when Vincent arrived, so he was forced to work inside, where he painted still lifes and self-portraits -- anything to keep his brush moving. In late March, spring finally arrived. In those days, a short walk from Place Lamartine led to open fields. Donning his straw hat, Vincent set up his easel outdoors and painted quickly, capturing what he saw and felt: In a similar manner, the bizarre lines, purposely selected and multiplied, meandering all through the picture may not present a literal image of the garden, but they may present it to our minds as if in a dream. He palled around with and painted his mailman and a Foreign Legionnaire. The fact that locals pronounced his name "vahn-saw van gog" had nothing to do with his psychological struggles here.
