People have come and gone in waves, leaving behind them mere remnants of a once wild city. Buildings endure, sometimes with as few as one or two walls intact. Houses stand in a various states of disarray, often abandoned and sometimes overgrown. Some have been restored, others have been demolished. The juxtaposition of old and new is unique and interesting. More intriguing, though, are the tales of local haunting, especially at the Asylum-turned-Hotel. Thus, I packed up my cameras and hit the highway. We traveled two hours north of Phoenix, towards Prescott and Flagstaff. Jerome was, once upon a time, a mining town. As people began to arrive in greater numbers, vice followed. Gambling, prostitution and drinking made Jerome notorious as a Wild West town. A series of fires and economic decline led to people leaving the city of behind them; Shortly after, wanderers began to occupy the abandoned homesteads. They tore apart the homes, using furniture and any other wood as fuel for their campfires. Remnants of the old times are littered about the city. Boarded-up homes next to occupied ones, wreckage and ruins next to parks ad playgrounds. As we walk, a hole in the wall that was once the doorway to a home is now just a dark tunnel. I thought this strange, but there are doors and passages built into walls randomly throughout the city streets. Bri and I stroll through the city streets. We come to an antique shop, but the business seems to be closed for the day, if not temporarily. As we begin to move on, a voice calls to us from the balcony above; An old woman has appeared, and she inquires about the nature of our visit. Dorothy, the old woman in the shop, gives us a tour of her home and explains to us the significance of each and every item in her homestead. Before we move on, we see a photograph above the steps: After heading out of the antique shop, we make our way to the Haunted Burger restaurant for some a quick bite. We drink from mason jars and consider our next move. Next up: Old-fashioned saloons, classic candy and fudge shoppes, the old copper mine, haunted houses and a thriving art community. It seems that almost every citizen in the town owns a classic car, but many use quads to get around the tiny town. The people, whether local or tourists, are often as interesting as the surrounding environment.
