

Chapter 1 : Acts, Laws, Rules and Statutes

The statutes available on this website are current through the 1st Called Session of the 85th Legislature, August The Texas Constitution is current through the amendments approved by voters in November

While each is developed to invoke a sense of order, fair play, and safety, the weight of a law is much heavier than the weight of a rule. Laws are like the legal version of rules. When you are a child, a parent sets rules to be followed. When you are in a society, the government sets laws to be followed. When a rule is broken, the consequences tend to be uncomfortable but mild in comparison to the breaking of a law. Laws are written in specific code so that they can be interpreted as needed. When you break a law there is legal action that follows, provided that you are caught. Rules are more flexible and carry low end consequences. You can set up rules for games, rules for the home, even rules for fighting or being intimate with a partner. Rules are personal in nature, and they are often adjusted as the conditions and circumstances of the home change. Laws must be passed through due process in order to take effect. A law starts off as a bill, and must go through a series of checks, balances, and votes in order to become a law. Rules are merely set and adjusted as the need arises, and should be followed out of respect for those setting the rules. Rules help us learn to prepare for living in society. As youngsters, we tend to learn that there are rules about hitting, stealing, lying, and being wasteful. As young adults, we are held accountable for these rules by becoming law abiding citizens. Laws are not meant to set teaching boundaries, but are there to be enforced, and are punishable by imprisonment and even death if they are broken. By the time you are old enough to contend with the law outside of children killing children you have already learned the process by dealing with various sets of rules. Laws are the legal variation of rules. Laws are enforced by governmental factors such as the police and prosecutors. Rules are set by individuals. Laws are set by the government. Laws must go through certain processes to become laws, including a voting process. Rules are set by organizations and individuals. Rules are more flexible, and have lighter consequences when broken. Laws are inflexible, and carry stiff penalties including imprisonment, and in some cases, death. Rules are set during childhood to prepare for living in accordance with laws. Laws are not a teaching tool, but a tool for keeping order in society. If you like this article or our site. Please spread the word.
