The name Lagos comes from a Celtic settlement, derived from the Latin Lacobriga, the name of the settlement was established during the pre-Punic civilizations. It became an early settlement of the Carthaginians, who recruited Celtic tribesmen in their war against the Romans the Punic Wars. Owing to its already important harbour, it was colonized by the Romans and integrated into the Roman province of Lusitania, becoming known as Lacobriga. With the fall of Rome, the town of Lagos was occupied in the 6th century by the Visigoths from the Kingdom of Toledo and later by the Byzantines. The Moors arrived in the 8th century from North Africa, renaming the settlement Zawaia meaning lagoon, or lake. It became part of the much larger coastal region of al-Gharb, which eventually became known as the Algarve. The Moors fortified the town with Lagos Castle and established important trade links to Northern Africa from their bases in the Iberian peninsula. Even as King Afonso Henriques advanced to the south, the Christian Reconquista never made it into Algarve and Alentejo, and remained under Moorish control. From this period on the King began self-styling himself as the "King of Portugal and the Algarve", stressing the fact that the Algarve which had for so long been ruled by the Moors as a foreign country had been annexed into the dominion of the Portuguese. Lagos became an independent jurisdiction under the rule of King Peter I in 1325. King John I assembled his fleet in the harbour of Lagos, before setting sail for the siege and conquest of the city of Ceuta in 1415. This was the first step in opening the Muslim world to medieval Europe, which in fact led to the Age of Discovery with Portuguese explorers sailing across the whole world. By the 15th century, Lagos became the centre of Portuguese maritime exploration, with ships ordered south to trace the shoreline of Africa in order to find routes to India. From here he directed expeditions to Morocco and to the western coast of Africa with caravels, lateen-rigged ships with excellent seafaring capabilities. Lagos was also the home port for Gil Eanes who was the first to sail beyond Cape Bojador in 1482, after a failed attempt in that put him out of favour with the king, then considered the end of the world. The act of rounding the Cape, much like the later rounding of the Cape of Good Hope, permitted Eanes and the navigators that followed to advance into the African subcontinent. It was also the gateway for the first African slaves into post-medieval Europe. The demand for the indentured labour force was so high that, by 1482, profit on Mauritanian slaves was 100 percent. Lisbon, began to prosper, with ships returning directly from the colonies of the Azores, Madeira and Brazil, while trading houses began to relocate to the capital. But, even as the wealth arrived in Lisbon and Lagos, the ostentation was widely on display in the royal residences. When Portugal came under Spanish rule, the Portuguese coast became a target for the English fleet. One of them was the late 16th-century Ponta da Bandeira Fort in Lagos, which was completed between 1589 and 1600 according to the stone inscription over the main door. From 1641 to 1757, Lagos was a high-profile capital of the Algarve, until the old Portuguese town was destroyed by the earthquake and tsunami of 1755. Two well-known naval battles took place off Lagos, reflecting its strategic location: These may be dated from the Serravallian, which, constitute the oldest marine mammal occurrence in Algarve.

Esta última entrega de la saga de Los lagos salió dos años después de Szigia y fue como una especie de regalo que quería hacerles Juani Hernández a sus lectores, ya que según lo que investigué esta iba a ser una trilogía y la verdad se puede notar en la forma como se escribieron los tres primeros libros.
